TWO ADDITIONAL TRAINS—A NEW VESTIBULE SERVICE—SOUTHERN TO ESTABLISH ANOTHER DAILY NORTH AND SOUTH SCHEDULE.

On the discontinuance of the Southern Railway's Palm Limited next Sunday, it is probable that the Washington and Southeastern Vestibuled Limited, Nos. 37 and 38, which has been running for some time in two sections, will be permanently divided into sections, the new sections taking the same numbers as Palm Limited, Nos. 31 and 32. It will virtually amount to routing the Palm Limited through Spartanburg.

For several months the growth of traffic on Nos. 37 and 38 has made it necessary to run them in two sections, one carrying mail and the other passengers. The officials think now that it will be necessary to do this regularly, and will make schedules for two new trains. The magnificent rolling stock of the Palm Limited will be used in the new trains, which will carry both mail and passengers. The addition of the new trains will enable the Southern to run its regular passenger trains more near'y on time than it is possible to operate them now.

It was reported that the new trains would be exclusive mail trains, made up like No. 97, and running between Washington and Atlanta; but a prominent Southern official seen yesterday said that there was no need for any more exclusive mail trains, and no intention of putting on any more.

It is difficult to secure a lower berth on a sleeping car between Washington and Charlotte without making arrangements for the same several days in advance. It is said that No. 97 is a solid mail train. No such claim is made or can be made in reference to the other subsidized train, No. 37, for the reason that I know this to be a passenger train. Nor is it true that No. 97 is entirely a mail train. To this train is attached at least one express car, and at Atlanta a passenger coach is attached. But if it were true that No. 97 is a solid mail train, this fact in itself would not justify the Government in paying $142,000 to the Southern Railroad as a bounty.

Solid mail trains are becoming common on many of the great railroads of the country, particularly between New York and Boston, New York and Buffalo, Buffalo and Chicago, and the following item, which is clipped from the Financial Review, shows that the practice of having such trains is extending west of the Mississippi River.

[Financial Review, April 6, 1906.]

The operation of a solid train carrying United States mail between Chicago and Portland, Oreg., over the Chicago and Northwestern, Union Pacific, Oregon Short Line, and Oregon Navigation Company, is one of the latest undertakings to receive attention from the Harriman lines. The experiment of running a similar train between Chicago and San Francisco has proved such a success that transportation of mail to the Northwest along similar lines has been decided upon.

Should the Southern Railroad take No. 97 off it would be necessary that another train be substituted in place of it, and with as fast a schedule, for two reasons: First, that the Southern Railroad would not be able to carry the amount of mail that is now carried between Washington and New Orleans without this additional train; and, second, that unless the fast schedule was maintained then the amount of mail now diverted to the Southern Railroad on account of this fast schedule would not be diverted, and as a consequence its regular mail pay would be less.

There is something else in connection with this that is probably not generally understood. It is supposed by many that whenever one of these subsidized trains—No. 97 and No. 37—running between Washington and New Orleans is late at Danville, Charlotte, Atlanta, Montgomery, or New Orleans, a reduction of the entire subsidy pay for that day is made. This is not the case. The Department has seen fit to divide the distance into five routes, to wit, from Washington to Danville, from Danville to Charlotte, from Charlotte to Atlanta, from Atlanta to Montgomery, and from Montgomery to New Orleans. For each one of these routes a certain amount of the $142,000 appropriated is apportioned, and the following letter from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General shows that failure to make schedule time does not result in loss of subsidy pay in one-half of the instances:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, March 12, 1906.

Hon. JESSE OVERSTREET,
Chairman Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 10th instant, as to the number of times during the fiscal year 1905 the special-facility trains on the Southern Railway between Washington and Atlanta were late at terminal points, I have to say that the service between Washington and Atlanta is covered by three routes of the Southern Railway:

(1) Route 114002, from Washington to Danville Junction: On this route train 37 was late five minutes or more at Danville Junction 260 times; train 97, 174 times.

(2) Route 118013, from Danville Junction to Charlotte: On this route train 37 was late five minutes or more at Charlotte 223 times; train 97, 145 times.

(3) Route 118049, from Charlotte to Atlanta: On this route train 37 was late five minutes or more at Atlanta 252 times; train 97, 144 times.

Total number of late arrivals at terminal points five minutes or more during the fiscal year, 1,198. Of this number deduction of special-facility pay was made for 545 late arrivals. As to the remainder of the late arrivals such satisfactory explanations were made that, under the practice of the Department, no deductions were made.

Very respectfully,

W. S. SHALLENBERGER,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

On page 329 of the hearings it is stated that in transporting the mail from Washington to New Orleans the regular railway-mail pay is $1,003,940.09. The railway post-office car pay for rent of R. P. O. cars is $223,497. The subsidy pay or bounty to the Southern Railroad after the deductions were taken off was, in the last fiscal year, $112,296.59, or a total paid to the Southern Railroad for carrying the mail between Washington and New Orleans, $1,339,733.68. The deductions made for failure to make schedule time in the last fiscal year amounted to $30,432.16. The total railway-mail pay for the southern division—North Carolina, Tennessee, Kentucky, South Carolina, Louisiana, Florida, Alabama, and Mississippi (eight States)—for the last fiscal year was the sum of $4,588,522.92. The railway-mail pay to the Southern Railroad on a single line from Washington to New Orleans was, as I have stated, $1,003,940.09, or over 22 per cent of all the railway-mail pay to railroads in the southern division. The reason for this large pay is that the Department diverts or throws all the mail that can be diverted to this railroad. This is fully set forth in the hearings before the Post-Office Committee, page 328 of hearings.

Now, one other reflection, and it is this: That by reason of these conditions other sections of the Southern States do not receive an equitable and expeditious distribution of the mail. There is of necessity a great deal of mail sent over the Southern Railroad that should go on the Atlantic Coast Line, the Seaboard Air Line, and other lines of railroads, and because of this favoritism to the Southern Railroad an injustice is done to the sections south of the Southern Railroad in Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina.

Through this territory, on lines practically parallel with the Southern Railroad, run the Seaboard Air Line Railroad and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad, covering to a large extent all the eastern and southern portions of the States mentioned. The reason for this great diversion of mail to the Southern is on account of the subsidy to this road.

In 1891 Second Assistant Postmaster-General Bell, in his annual report, gave the following reasons for declining to recommend further appropriations for subsidies:

> The continuance of the special-facility allowance has for some years past been the source of much annoyance to the Department, and has hampered the best interests of the mail service, because railroads operating in contiguous territory and, to some extent, paralleling the roads which receive the extra pay object to rendering equally good or quicker schedule mail service except they be paid corresponding rates. They ask that all be treated alike.

To illustrate: My information is that the Seaboard Air Line Railroad makes quicker time between Washington and Columbia, S. C., than does the Southern Railroad; and this may be said also of the Atlantic Coast Line between Washington and Charleston, S. C.

Mail is diverted to many railroads in the United States which receive no subsidy, and in such cases one or more trains are designated by the Post-Office Department—important trains on account of the high schedule maintained. To these trains the Department throws or diverts all the mail possible, and by reason of the increased quantity of mail carried the railway mail pay is correspondingly increased.

There are only two lines of railroad in the United States which receive a subsidy, the Southern Railroad, from Washington to New Orleans, $142,000, and the Atchison road, from Kansas City, Mo., to Newton, Kans., $25,000. I am of the opinion that my State and the greater part of North Carolina would have better and more expeditious mail facilities than they now have if Congress should refuse this appropriation. A great deal of mail is now diverted to the Southern Railroad which should be carried by the Seaboard Air Line Railroad, the Atlantic Coast Line, and roads other than the Southern. This results, of course, in injury to the people living in those sections of Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina reached more directly from Washington by the Seaboard and Coast Line than by the Southern. Besides this, it is unfair to these railroads. In the event they carried more mail they would receive more pay and be able to render better service.

The following letter, written to my colleague, Hon. A. F. LEVER, and handed to me by him during this debate, shows conclusively that I am correct in my contention that in a general sense No. 97 does not expedite the delivery of mail in South Carolina:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, March 28, 1906.

Hon. A. F. LEVER,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 24th instant, relative to Southern fast mail train No. 97.

In reply you are informed that that train does not advance the delivery of mail to any point in your district, for the reason that it makes no connection with trains running into the district, which connections are not made by other trains which could carry the mail. Train No. 97 is scheduled to leave Washington, D. C., at 8 a. m. and to arrive at Charlotte, N. C., at 5.20 p. m., at which latter place it makes connection with train No. 29, which leaves Washington at 10.51 a. m. and Charlotte at 9.50 p. m. for Columbia, S. C., and other points in your district.

Concerning the effect the cutting off of the appropriation specially made for train No. 97 would have on mail for the South, I will say that if train No. 97 should be discontinued the mail it now carries would revert to trains Nos. 29 and 35.

The scheduled time of trains Nos. 97, 29, and 35 at the principal stations is as follows:

City.	Train No. 97.	Trains Nos. 29 and 35.
Washington, D. C	8.00 a. m.	10.55 a. m.
Charlottesville, Va	10.44 a. m.	1.43 p. m.
Lynchburg, Va	12.20 p. m.	3.34 p. m.
Danville, Va	1.53 p. m.	5.20 p. m.
Greensboro, N. C	3.03 p. m.	6.44 p. m.
Charlotte, N. C	5.20 p. m.	9.45 p. m.
Spartanburg, S. C	7.15 p. m.	12.30 a. m.
Greenville, S. C	8.10 p. m.	1.35 a. m.
Atlanta, Ga	12.07 a. m.	6.10 a. m.
Montgomery, Ala	3.17 a. m.	10.55 a. m.
Mobile, Ala	7.37 a. m.	4.12 p. m.
New Orleans, La	11.15 a. m.	8.15 p. m.

Very respectfully,

W. S. SHALLENBERGER,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

P. S.—Train 29 runs from Washington to Charlotte; train 35, from Charlotte to New Orleans.

The cities of Charleston, Sumter, Florence, Marion, Bennettsville, Camden, Cheraw, Rock Hill, Greenwood, and scores of other towns in South Carolina would have better and quicker mail facilities without this favoritism to the Southern Railroad, for the reason that the railroads in the State other than the Southern would be better paid, and, of course, able to render better service.

To sum up my objections: First, it is a bounty or subsidy; second, it is not necessary, and, third, it results in an inequitable and inefficient distribution of the mail throughout my section of the country, and I may add further that no letters or resolutions from any board of trade organization or individuals in the Congressional district which I have the honor to represent have ever been sent to me advocating the payment of this subsidy to the Southern Railroad. I am opposed to this item of appropriation.

In conclusion, I wish to state most emphatically that I have no prejudice against the Southern Railroad. My position would be the same if the Government was giving the subsidy to the Seaboard, the Atlantic Coast Line, or any other railroad. I am opposed to subsidies on principle. My highest aim is to represent all of my constituents (and I include the railroads in my district in the number) impartially, and from a standpoint of doing what is best for them and the country as a whole.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I say that this subsidy is not asked for by the Department and that it is not needed in this service. Assistant Postmaster-General Shallenberger, in his report last issued, makes this statement, and it is all he says on the point:

> The appropriation for the current fiscal year is $167,720. No estimate is submitted for the next fiscal year.

In the RECORD of April, 1901, you will find his letter on the subject, which, in part, says:

> In 1893 the Department discontinued the special-facilities appropriation for the Atlantic Coast Line from New York by way of Washington, Wilmington, Charleston, and Jacksonville; but Congress, without any recommendation from the Department, made the appropriation now in question—that is, for the Southern Railroad.

Again he says:

> We believe also that these conditions have long since been outgrown, and that we have now other lines between nearly all important points in the country, so that we have found it possible to establish service entirely adequate.

Again he says he recommended against it. I read a question put to him, and his reply:

> Mr. MOODY. Isn't the matter discretionary with the Department, even after Congress makes the appropriation?
> Answer. Well, the Department would have the power to withhold it, but, having recommended to Congress the advisability of withholding it, the Department is bound to assume that Congress desires the appropriation to be expended so long as it is made.

Having recommended against it, he says, yet as Congress continues in appropriating this subsidy he is bound to use it, taking the appropriation thus made as being mandatory.

I went to the Department yesterday and to-day to get the schedules of these trains to see whether or not they run faster with the subsidy than without it. I was referred by General Shallenberger to Mr. Crew, the superintendent of the railroad adjustment. Mr. Crew said, in substance, to me—I have his words right here—that with and without the subsidy that No. 37 made the trip from Washington to New Orleans in thirty-two and one-half hours; that No. 35 did the same thing with or without it; that No. 97 made the trip in twenty-seven hours and fifteen minutes, with mail and express only; that eighteen months ago the railroad, by consent of the Department, substituted No. 97 for No. 35, which was then subsidized, and was making the trip in thirty-two and one-half hours, as it is now doing without it; that No. 37 was then making the trip without a subsidy in thirty-two and one-half hours, the same time it is making the trip now with the subsidy; that on September 24, 1893, the subsidy begun and was given to train 35; that before this it run only to Atlanta; that after the subsidy it run to New Orleans in thirty-five hours and some minutes.

In brief, gentlemen, since September, 1893, No. 35, with the subsidy, and No. 37, without it, down to eighteen months ago made the trip in thirty-two and one-half hours. That No. 37 was eighteen months ago subsidized, and makes the trip now in the same time. Nothing is gained here by the subsidy with train 37, while 35 is run, making the same trip in the same time it did before the subsidy was taken from it eighteen months ago and given to 97.

The commerce and mail of this road has so increased that it felt compelled to put on 97 to help carry it. Up to eighteen months ago this thirty-two and one-half hours' service by 35 and 37 was satisfactory to the people, but the business of the road so increased 97 was put on the road. Suppose it was taken off? Would not the mail be then carried, as formerly, on trains 35 and 37, both of which have made this trip, with and without the subsidy, in thirty-two and one-half hours, and are compelled to run? They can't be stopped.

General Shallenberger said to me yesterday—I have his words here:

> We think the business on this road, as on all other roads, has so increased now as to compel the railroad to give that fast mail service, as fast as is necessary, for the business of the people, such character of fast mail service as the country needs, and such service we give over the country generally now without any special service.

He did not say that he could get this twenty-seven-hour service, because that is one of special contract based on this appropriation. But he did say that he could give the people such a fast mail service as the country needs and gets everywhere else. I insist, therefore, that we should save this money and extend our free rural delivery system.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, the only question to settle here this afternoon is this—not how much it costs a mile, not whether the Southern Railroad runs one train or forty. The question is, Does this appropriation facilitate the mail to the people benefited to the extent that authorizes the appropriation? That is the whole of this question. If this appropriation is a subsidy, then the whole bill before the Committee of the Whole is a subsidy from start to finish. For not in the history of this Government has the postal system paid its expenses. If a part of it is a subsidy, then all of it is a subsidy, and the only two questions involved are, Can you give the people of this country mail facilities? Yes. How cheap can you give it to them? Not by cutting off here and there or somewhere else, but it is your duty to give it to every man, woman, and child living within the limits of the Government. [Applause.]

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] makes such reckless expressions that it is hard to answer them, but I want to give him an illustration as to the absurdity of his last statement, that "it hurts the farmer." No. 97 reaches Atlanta at 11.30 with all this mail distributed for the different cities, and the different railroads, in sacks. The mail doesn't go to the Post-Office Department at all; it is distributed in the yard to six trains standing on the railroads at Atlanta, with the steam up and the engineers at the throttles. These six trains do what? They take this mail from New York and from Washington, take it into every section of Georgia, into every section of Alabama, and into parts of Tennessee, and the same thing is repeated farther on on the same line. Now, then, who gets the benefit of it? Every country merchant, every country doctor, every farmer, every school teacher, and everybody else that lives in Georgia or Alabama away from the city of Atlanta. When do they get it? The next morning at breakfast.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No; I will not yield now; I will hear you in a moment. They get it the next morning at breakfast, and every rural carrier in my State gets that mail the next morning, and takes it out all over the State of Georgia into every hamlet and corner of the State. Now I will hear what the gentleman from Tennessee wishes to ask me.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman from Georgia if he knows how much money the Government of the United States pays this particular road from here to New Orleans for carrying the mail? I mean the general mail pay.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will answer the gentleman in this way: That where it pays $100,000 the people receive the benefit of $500,000.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not think so. Does the gentleman know that it is a fact that this railroad company gets $1,340,000 a year?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If it is true, and the cost is your trouble, why don't you have the mail carried on freight cars? [Laughter.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will tell the gentleman if he will yield to me a moment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Why not?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, my distinguished friend from North Carolina referred to the speech I made a few days ago, and stated that I had expressed myself that the Southern Railroad is partly paid by the advertisement or publicity that it realizes from running this fast mail train. Sir, I reaffirm that statement. I believe there is some credit and some reputation that is reflected by the fact that this railroad is charged with the responsibility of discharging this important duty to the people along the line of its route. At all the different points the people await with anxiety the arrival of this mail train.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the fervid declamation of my friend from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN], referring to the premises upon which he reached his conclusion, as stated in his able speech a few days since. His former statement was that train No. 94 earned $1.92 per mile. I want this House just for a moment to listen to me read just exactly the premises and foundation upon which my distinguished friend Mr. KITCHIN reached his conclusions. I do not think I can better use the few minutes allowed than reciting the remarkable conjectures, guesses, and speculations that my friend made to reach his conclusion, and let the House see how unreasonable are his calculations. And upon that hypothetical condition of affairs and statement the gentleman from North Carolina reached his conclusion that $1.91 was the expense——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I would ask, Mr. Chairman, how much time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes remains to which the gentleman is entitled, and two minutes to the other side.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I ask recognition to close the debate for the remaining time on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the mover of the motion desire recognition? [After a pause.] The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for the two minutes remaining on that side.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, this question is now being argued upon its merits. The fact seems to be conceded on both sides of the House that this is a special favor to a special road that no other roads receive, and it is claimed it is justified because it facilitates the transmission of mail. Now, I agree with the Department officers that it does not facilitate the transmission of mail, and this section of country is no more entitled to a special favor than any other. Upon the question of authority I appeal to this House, to those Members in favor of this appropriation who have not had the time to investigate for themselves, to rely somewhat upon the authority of those who have investigated it. This was investigated by the Postal Commission, and six out of eight unanimously reported three years ago against the allowance of this special-facility pay. Senators Wolcott, ALLISON, and Chandler reported against it; Representatives Moody, Loud, and Fleming reported against it, and the present Postmaster-General, Mr. Cortelyou, recommends against this item. He is part of this Administration, and we must recognize him as spokesman for the Post-Office Department. General Shallenberger says he is opposed to any special favor to any railroad; that they ought to be left upon an equal footing and all receive equal treatment. That is the policy recommended by the Department, and I believe it is fair that they should all be treated alike, and therefore, as I stated in my speech at the opening discussion of this bill, I hope that the item will be voted out; that no special favors be granted to anybody; and I am sure from what I have learned that the South and this country served by this railroad will not suffer in the least for the lack of mail facilities, but that it will be served as well as it was before. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, there is no occasion for Members to work themselves into a frenzy over this proposition. These facilities have been authorized by law for something like twelve or fourteen years. There are, aside from the fast mail trains authorized in the two sections of the bill, now under consideration, 56 fast mail trains and 15 so-called "fast mail newspaper" trains. These 56 fast mail trains and 15 fast mail newspaper trains are made practicable by reason of the concentration upon them of great quantities of mail which might under the regular distribution of mail go upon a variety of roads reaching their respective destination. But we fail to find a sufficient quantity of mail concentrating at Washington which may be diverted from various lines and concentrated upon one line in order to give to it an advantage by virtue of the additional weight of mail which would result in an additional profit for that facility and justify the road in maintaining a fast schedule. I am inclined to believe that if this appropriation were disallowed that the people throughout Georgia, the Carolinas, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Texas would continue to receive their mail, but not as expeditiously nor as promptly as under this provision. Under the regulations of the Department which have been operative throughout all of these years where these roads enjoy this facility, they are obliged to maintain a fixed schedule of speed, and a failure to maintain that schedule at any terminal of any railway mail route to the extent of five minutes works a forfeiture of the proportion of the appropriation for that particular run. Under this appropriation last year the Southern road forfeited $36,161.08 by reason of the failure to make these schedules required by the Department. Therefore these roads receive only such proportion of the appropriation as fall under the exact requirements for the maintenance of the schedule. This facility operates to put the mail from New York to New Orleans in time not only to give the New York papers and New York mail delivery in that city six hours earlier than they would enjoy if this facility were removed, but that quantity of mail destined for points further south, into Texas and beyond, catches the overland limited, which, if they failed to catch, the mail would lie in New Orleans until evening before it was dispatched upon its journey.

If the facility from Kansas City to Newton, Kans., were removed, the newspapers destined for points west of Kansas City and Newton, Kans., would doubtless be delivered, but they would be delivered much later. By reason of this facility, that train leaving Kansas City about 2 o'clock in the morning overtakes the train at Newton, Kans., which left Kansas City at 8 or 9 o'clock in the evening, and delivers to that train, so overtaken, the mail destined beyond Newton, thereby expediting the delivery of the mail to those people enjoying the privilege west of that city.

The Post-Office Department has not recommended this appropriation, for a reason which is to be found in the hearings before the Post-Office Committee. The reason, as given substantially by General Shallenberger, is that they refuse to recommend any special-facility appropriation, because they do not want a precedent that would come to haunt them when applications should be made throughout the country by other roads. But the Second Assistant Postmaster-General said that, notwithstanding they made no such recommendation, the service had received additional facilities by reason of this appropriation, but they did not desire to be put in a position of recommending it. He stated that they were able to put the mail from New York, by way of Washington and Atlanta, into New Orleans at the time that I have already suggested.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is not in the interest of the railroads, against which some of the gentlemen on the other side have hurled their anathemas, but it is in the interest of the people of Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia, and Louisiana, who are given facilities by reason of the expeditious delivery of this mail, which they would not receive in the event this fast mail schedule were not maintained. The committee believes—most of them, because there is division in the committee upon this—I certainly believe from the evidence which we have received, that if this appropriation should fail, this schedule would not be maintained, and there would be an impairment of the service by lack of prompt and expeditious delivery of the mail through this section of country.

I certainly hope the amendment to strike this item from the bill will fail, and I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to strike out lines 5 to 11 on page 22.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Division!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 108.

Mr. NORRIS. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 102, noes 106.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Kansas City, Mo., to Newton, Kans., $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 22, lines 12 to 18, strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

For manufacture of adhesive postage stamps, special-delivery stamps, and books of stamps, $550,000: Provided, That no contract for the manufacture of adhesive postage stamps, special-delivery stamps, or books of stamps shall be made by the Government with any Department or bureau of the Government at any higher rate than offered for the same work by any responsible private contractor, nor shall the bid of such Department or bureau be at a price below the cost of such work to the Government.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of the paragraph: "But in computing the cost of the work only the actual expense of such Department or bureau as will be made necessary for such work shall be reckoned."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order, but will hear an explanation of the amendment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The amendment is to the paragraph that authorizes the letting of contracts for the manufacture of adhesive stamps and restricting the right of a Department or bureau of the Government to submit bids for such contracts. The proviso in the paragraph states that no Department or bureau of the Government shall submit any bid at a price below the cost of the work to the Government. Now, the effect of the amendment I propose is to provide that in computing the cost of the work only the additional expense to the Department or bureau of doing the work shall be reckoned.

Adhesive stamps are now made by the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, and the Government has to maintain that establishment in any event. It already has the establishment and must provide for its superintendence, for its lighting and heating. It already has machinery and equipment for the manufacture of adhesive stamps, and in determining the cost of the work for the purpose of submitting bids, I simply desire to limit the Department or Bureau to the actual additional expense. It might be that under the provision of the bill only that element of expense would be reckoned, but in determining the cost of the manufacture of a product, as a rule a relative share of the cost of superintendence, of the cost of maintenance of the plant, of the cost of lighting and heating is reckoned. We must pay a large share of the cost of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving whether stamps are manufactured by the Government or not, because it must be maintained for other purposes, and it is not fair to the people, it is not fair to the Treasury, to exclude that Bureau from submitting bids on account of a fixed expense which the Government must pay whether it manufactures adhesive stamps or not. What I want to do is to make this paragraph clear. I want to put it in such condition that only the additional cost made necessary by the work itself shall be reckoned in determining the question of cost as a limitation upon the power of the Bureau to submit a bid. I think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] ought to accept the amendment. It seems to me to be so fair and so in harmony with economic administration that there ought to be no opposition to it at all. If the Government, with the Bureau already established and equipped, can, with a a comparatively small additional cost, make adhesive postage stamps, if it can make them more cheaply, if the additional cost would be less than it would have to pay a private manufacturer, then economy demands that postage stamps should be manufactured by the Bureau of Printing and Engraving.

Under the bill as it is written it might operate to exclude the Bureau of Printing and Engraving from submitting a bid, because of the cost of maintaining the Bureau, which must be paid by the Treasury anyhow. I do not think that ought to be. I believe if the Government can manufacture its own stamps as cheaply in one of its own bureaus as can be done by private contract, it ought to do so. It ought to have control of this particular work, just as it has control of the printing of money and bonds. But that Bureau certainly ought to have the right to submit a bid without the advantage that it already has in the way of equipment, in the way of establishment, operating against it. The effect of the amendment is to provide that simply the additional cost of the particular work shall be reckoned in determining the right of the Bureau to submit a bid, and the expense of maintaining the Bureau, which the Government must bear in any event, should not be considered as part of the cost of the work of manufacturing stamps.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the provision which the committee recommends is that no contract shall be made by the Government with any bureau of the Government at a loss to the Government. Whatever force there may be in the gentleman's amendment relative to the elements of cost which ought to be considered in making the calculation, it is unwise, in my judgment, to complicate the situation by putting into the statute in what way they shall make the calculation. We only seek to save the Government loss in this when the contract is carried by a different bureau of the Government when compared with the offer made by outside responsible contractors. I hope the amendment will be disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a statement consisting of half a dozen lines.

The statement is as follows:

Mr. MOON. Then, General, let me come down to the very bottom question of administration: Do you want this money or not?

General SHALLENBERGER. We are not asking it, nor expressing an opinion in reference to it.

Mr. MOON. What is the reason that you all are silent on that question?

General SHALLENBERGER. We are not silent.

Mr. MOON. You say you do not ask it?

General SHALLENBERGER. We do not estimate for it.

Mr. MOON. And what is the reason you do not ask it?

General SHALLENBERGER. Because we think that the effect upon the service at large is better if we do not select any particular route in any particular section for special favors.

Mr. MOON. Then you do not select it because you think that it is a bad example, and that it affects the railway mail service elsewhere to give this subsidy?

General SHALLENBERGER. That is the situation.

Mr. MOON. That is the situation. So you think that for the good of the service the thing ought not to be done, taking the country at large?

General SHALLENBERGER. Why, I think that for the good of the service at large it is better that no special favors be given to any one particular road or system.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of agent and assistants to distribute stamps, and expenses of agency, $11,280.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 4, 5, and 6, on page 24. Provision for these offices was made in the legislative appropriation bill.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The appropriation for the fiscal year 1906 of $25,000 for the employment of special counsel to prosecute and defend suits affecting the second-class mailing privilege is hereby reappropriated and made available for the fiscal year 1907.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the end of line 4, page 23, the following: "All regular periodical publications issued from a known place of publication at stated intervals and as frequently as twelve times a year, by or under the auspices of charitable, educational, or religious institutions, which institutions are not conducted for pecuniary profit, if such publications are made to further the objects and purposes of such institutions and are formed of printed paper sheets, without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding such as distinguish printed books for preservation from periodical publications, are under the true meaning of existing law entitled to be admitted to the mail as second-class matter and at the rate of postage fixed for second-class matter and no more, and the existing laws with reference to the second-class mail matter shall hereafter be so interpreted."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, much as I regret to ask it at this late hour, I desire to speak ten minutes on this amendment, and I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for ten minutes without interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it is a familiar fact to all that second-class mail matter is carried at a loss, and it is familiar to all of us that there has been a highly commendable and laudable effort made to reduce this loss to the Government. With that effort I am in entire sympathy, and I do not wish to criticise anything that has been done with that in view, but I do want to call attention to some extraordinary results of this effort at reform.

In former times if a high school wanted to issue a little paper as an aid in the education of the students, the paper went through the mails as second-class matter. If a church wanted to issue a monthly paper it went through the mails as second-class matter. If a charitable institution wanted to issue a paper it was allowed to go through the mails as second-class matter. And because of this fact there have grown up in this country charitable institutions that actually live and exist by means of the communication thus furnished between them and the charitable and benevolent people of this country. In this effort to cut off papers from second-class privileges these three classes have been recently excluded in whole or in part. And yet, under the same administration of the law, and under the same law under which these papers formerly circulated, the Police News, the Police Gazette, Town Topics, the yellow journals, and the more yellow magazines are still entitled to be taken through the mails of the United States at a great loss to the Government.

It is to be remembered that while the second-class matter does not pay an adequate price, the third-class pays more than a compensatory price, and so under the recent interpretation of the law the church, and the school, and charity must pay to the Government of the United States a price in excess of the cost of the service rendered, that the profits may be applied to paying the loss on these contemptible journals which I have referred to.

Why, it is said that these are advertising bulletins of these schools, and these churches, and these charities. Perhaps they are; perhaps they are advertisements, but if they are it does seem to me that if we are going to carry a large portion of our mail at a loss we ought not to carry the advertisements of the devil at a price that is not compensatory, and then charge more than cost to carry advertisements of the work of the Almighty. [Applause.] It is said that these are not newspapers. Now, I do not know accurately what constitutes news, but I have it in mind that the Christian plan of salvation is news to a generation which buys and reads with avidity "The treason of the Senate."

These orphanages are about to be closed under this recent interpretation of the law. I am asking no change in the law; I am asking that the law as it existed for a generation be interpreted as to these papers as it has been interpreted for a generation. Why, we are allowing these scribblers who have realized in these modern days the dream of the ancients and have discovered a method by which the base lead of libel may be converted into the pure gold coin of the Republic—we are allowing their writings to go through the mails at a loss, and propose to tax at more than a compensatory rate other publications that tend to uplift and elevate humanity and care for the poor, the downtrodden and suffering. It is this system of discrimination against which I raise my voice in protest here today. If nothing is done now countless orphans must suffer as the result of the loss of these facilities to reach the charitable and benevolent. I have had a bill pending before this committee since before the holidays for this relief, and I say if relief is not given now within a year the cries of hungry orphans will be calling to judgment the gentlemen who defeat this just relief to charity, religion, and education. [Applause.] I purpose to show that this amendment is identical with amendments held in order by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on this identical bill in the Fifty-third Congress if the point of order is insisted upon. I hope it will not be, because all that we ask is that the frail bark of human virtue shall have equal rights upon the navigable waters with piratical crafts carrying the black flag. [Loud and continued applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, it is never inopportune to call attention to the statement that history repeats itself.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman raise the point of order?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do, and I am now arguing it; that is simply an introductory statement. The gentleman from Iowa says he can cite the Chair to an identical proposition which was held by a former chairman to be in order, and that is true. On April 6, 1894, an amendment practically upon all fours with the one now offered by the gentleman from Iowa was held by Mr. Hatch, then in the chair, to be in order, for the reason that the amendment was in the nature of an interpretation or construction of the existing statute. At a later day, however, Mr. Chairman, on the 17th of January, 1896, while a Member of this House, known to many of us, loved by all, occupied the chair, in the person of Hon. Nelson Dingley, of Maine, that ruling of Mr. Hatch was overruled by a new decision in which the gentleman from Maine introduced his remarks with the following statement, which is a further evidence of history repeating itself by the effort of the gentleman from Iowa to excite the sympathy of this House, if not the Chair, in an effort to violate the rules by admitting his amendment against the point of order. Mr. Dingley used the following language, Mr. Chairman, in the decision to which I have referred, rendered by him on January 17, 1896:

The question of order which has been raised assumes special importance because of the fact that if there should be any variation from the construction of a rule as it has always governed in Committee of the Whole on account of a sympathy that we may have for the particular legislation proposed, it would be a precedent that would rise to trouble us in all subsequent propositions looking to legislation in appropriation bills.

I call from the dead, from an authority recognized in the House, this voice which is, though still, a warning against being controlled by sympathy for legislation, notwithstanding that legislation would clearly violate the rules of the House which operate against enacting legislation upon appropriation bills. In the body of his decision, Mr. Chairman, discussing the fact that you can not legislate upon an appropriation bill in the nature of interpretation or construction of a statute already upon the statute books, Mr. Dingley used this expression:

It has been contended that the pending paragraph is merely a construction of existing law, and that a construction of the meaning and intent of a law which has been heretofore enacted is not the "new legislation" prohibited by the rule. Everyone knows that no legislative construction can be given to a law that is upon the statute book without a legislative enactment. A construction of an existing law by an act of Congress must be itself a piece of legislation that has been passed by the two Houses of Congress and received the approval of the President. In fact, it is new legislation in every sense, because if it should be held that any act of legislation could be put upon an appropriation bill simply because it professed to construe an anterior law, any gentleman could propose an amendment giving any kind of construction to an anterior law, whether right or wrong, thus opening up in the consideration of an appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole any proposition for new legislation under the guise of construing the law.

It does not seem to me that there can be any distinction made in this respect between different legislative acts. If an act is in fact new legislation, it seems to the Chair that it is subject to the point of order under the rule that it is new legislation or (what is the same thing) a change of existing law as construed by the authority that can alone construe it, subject to an appeal to the courts, unless Congress shall step in and construe it by a new law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Indiana has read enough to settle the matter in the mind of the Chair. Following the decision that the gentleman has just read, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. With all possible due respect, and owing to the emergency which I think here exists, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The committee divided; and the Chair counted the affirmative vote.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The temper of the House evidently being in favor of sustaining the Chair, I withdraw the appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman withdraws his appeal.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Postmaster-General is authorized to extend, for a period not exceeding six months, the contract for official, registry, and dead-letter envelopes for the postal service for the calendar year ending December 31, 1906; and thereafter the Postmaster-General shall contract, for a period not exceeding four years, for all envelopes, stamped or otherwise, designed for sale to the public, or for use by the Post-Office Department, the postal service, and other Executive Departments, and all Government bureaus and establishments, and the branches of the service coming under their jurisdiction, and may contract for them to be plain or with such printed matter as may be prescribed by the Department making requisition therefor: Provided, That no envelope shall be sold by the Government containing any lithographing or engraving, nor any printing nor advertisement, except a printed request to return the letter to the writer.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, on page 26, line 2, the words "except a printed request to return the letter to the writer."

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of letter carriers and clerks in charge of substations of rural delivery service, $28,200,000: Provided, That not to exceed $15,000 of the amount hereby appropriated may be used for compensation of clerks in charge of substations.

Mr. SMYSER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend on page 27, lines 17 and 18, by striking out the words "twenty-eight million two hundred thousand dollars" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "thirty-two million four hundred thousand dollars: Provided, That not to exceed $4,200,000 of said sum so appropriated shall be expended for horse hire and wagon equipment in the rural mail service."

Mr. OVERSTREET. I make the point of order against that amendment. It is contrary to existing law, but I will reserve the point of order for the present.

Mr. SMYSER. Compensation of rural carriers per year—maximum, $720; minimum, $432. The rural carrier must furnish his own equipment—horses and wagon. This entails on him an expense of at least $200 per year. I have the statements of seven carriers of my own town, and they show an average expense of $254.69 per year.

It must be borne in mind that the carrier goes every day except Sunday. It must also be borne in mind that one horse can not do the work; such a daily grind will soon use up a very fair horse. If the cost of maintaining is correct as given me by my own carriers, they are receiving but a trifle over $1.50 per day, and in addition his stock in trade is daily wearing out. Under the present law there is no provision for increased pay after one or two years. In other words, length of service wears out his team and wagon, with nothing to compensate him or enable him to replace them.

Is the rural carrier fairly treated as compared with the city carrier? It is idle to discuss the character of the services; one is as arduous as the other. In cities of less than 75,000 inhabitants the carrier for the first year receives $600; the second year and thereafter, $850. His compensation is net to him—no outlay but clothes and shoe leather; no horse to feed, get sick and die; no wagon to break down or keep in repair. This carrier receives nearly twice the pay the rural carrier gets. This is neither fair nor just.

I now want to call attention to the compensation of the carrier in the city of over 75,000 inhabitants. For the first year it is $600, for the second year it is $800, and for the third year it is $1,000. A regular civil-service graduation. But it may be said that the city carrier incurs an expense to which the ordinary rural carrier is not subjected, and therefore he should receive a greater compensation. Even if this suggestion be true the Government meets it by providing for this. Why, Mr. Chairman, this bill makes an appropriation for horse hire and car fare and bicycle allowance to the city carriers in cities of 75,000 inhabitants and upwards. This bill appropriates the sum of $1,065,000, so that the extraordinary expenses of the city carrier is met and paid by the Government, and the city carrier receives his annual stipend intact and undiminished by any outlay whatsoever. So the rural carrier is again treated unfairly and unjustly. He suffers in two ways. First, as to amount of compensation, and second, by being compelled to furnish his own outfit and bear the expense of its maintenance.

And, Mr. Chairman, this injustice I hope to correct by the amendment which I have submitted. Another glaring instance against the rural carrier is to be found in the appropriation already passed by the House for the payment of the city police. We have in the city mounted police; some ride horses and some ride bicycles. The bill to which I have alluded provides that each mounted policeman shall receive $250 per annum for horse hire or maintenance and the bicycle mounted policeman $50 per annum for bicycle maintenance. So, Mr. Chairman, I am constrained to say Congress deals unjustly and unfairly with the rural carrier. It is a service in which we can afford to exercise a decent liberality in expending the public money. The rural carrier is a faithful and efficient public servant. He serves the farming community, made up of industrious, loyal, and intelligent citizens. The farmer is the beneficiary of the service for which I am asking fair and decent pay. He is patient and forbearing. He asks but little at the hands of the Government. He sees Congress expending large, yes, enormous sums of money to build up a navy, maintain an army, extend our fortifications, build a canal, but he is quiet and complacent about it. He does not grumble and find fault, although he sees no direct and immediate benefit accruing to him. He feels that, perhaps, they are necessary for the maintenance, welfare, and glory of his country, and he cheerfully acquiesces.

But in the operation of the rural mail service he sees the operation of the Government at his very door, and in this service contemplates its beneficence as well as its munificence, and a generous appropriation for the public service of which he is a partial recipient will meet his hearty indorsement. [Loud applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 20, page 27, add: "Provided further, That no part of the money appropriated in this paragraph shall be expended for the payment of the salary of a carrier on any rural free-delivery route on which the mail is carried less than six times a week, except those weeks in which, under the rules and regulations of the Post-Office Department, there are legal holidays, and except on those routes on which, by the rules and regulations of the Post-Office Department, there are less than six deliveries a week at the date of the enactment of this law."

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. FLOOD. I will ask the chairman of the committee if it is not a fact that the Department have reduced the deliveries on some of the routes from daily to three times a week.

Mr. OVERSTREET. In some instances it has been done with the consent of the people living along the route. The gentleman's amendment would compel the Government to maintain this service even if the patrons did not want it maintained.

Mr. FLOOD. The amendment would compel the Government to give six deliveries a week on all these routes. I can not conceive that there are any routes in this country that would want less than six deliveries.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will have to interpose the point of order.

Mr. FLOOD. I concede the point of order, and offer this amendment in place of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FLOOD. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 20, page 27, add: "And provided further, That there shall be six deliveries of mail a week by the carrier on each rural free-delivery route established prior to the 1st day of April, 1906, and not discontinued by the Postmaster-General, except those weeks in which, under the rules and regulations of the Post-Office Department, there are legal holidays."

Mr. OVERSTREET. I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FLOOD. I will discuss the point of order, with the permission of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FLOOD. I move to strike out the last word, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment that has just been offered is a limitation upon the section under consideration and is similar in character to the amendments that have heretofore been sustained by the Chair. A point of order, therefore, will not lie to it.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to stop a known movement on the part of the Post-Office Department to lessen the number of deliveries upon the rural free-delivery routes.

It is a curious state of affairs; it is a travesty upon representative government; it is a reflection upon this House, that this great rural free-delivery system has only six lines of legislation at the hands of Congress each year, and these six lines simply make an appropriation for the support of the system. Everything else in reference to it is turned over to the tender mercies of the subordinates of the Post-Office Department, a Department which is unfriendly to the system.

A suggestion has been made, and by many is believed to be true, that the Republican party is unfriendly to the system. The attitude of the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads on this question, a gentleman who has occupied a high position in the Republican organization and still occupies a high position in the organization of this House, gives strong grounds for this belief. The attitude of the Post-Office Department, presided over as it is by the distinguished, able, and efficient chairman of the national Republican committee, gives still stronger grounds for believing this to be true, and justifies the further belief that under the present régime there is not only but small hope that the service will be extended, but there are strong grounds for the fear that it will be reduced and weakened. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, if this move is not stopped by Congress, the people of the rural districts will have an inferior service to what they did have before the rural free-delivery system was inaugurated by the foresight and wisdom of the Democratic party. This system was given to the country people for their benefit and advantage. Now, the post-office officials propose to weaken and ultimately destroy it. This movement is unwise and is unjust to the farmers of the country. Prior to the inauguration of the rural delivery system there were a large number of small post-offices supplied by star routes scattered all over the country. The service rendered by these offices was by no means as efficient and as convenient as that given by the delivery of mail under the rural free-delivery system, where there are six deliveries a week, but it was a great deal more convenient that it would be by the rural delivery system with three deliveries a week.

The rural delivery system has unquestionably been a great boon to the people of the rural districts. To discontinue daily service on rural routes and substitute therefor triweekly deliveries would be a long step backward. It would be a step backward of ten years, for it was ten years ago that the Democratic party inaugurated the system. It would prevent the people living on triweekly routes from receiving daily papers and would give to patrons on one-half of the route the weekly county papers one day earlier than those of the other half. There can be no doubt that the old system of numerous fourth-class post-offices and daily star routes would furnish better facilities than this triweekly delivery.

It would not only inconvenience the people, but it would cripple and ultimately destroy the triweekly routes. To illustrate, say A is a small railway post-office from which there are two rural routes established which do not handle the requisite number of pieces of mail per month. Prior to the establishment of these rural free delivery routes there emanated from this post-office a star route which supplied, say, three post-offices, B, C, and D. After the establishment of the rural delivery routes this star route and three post-offices are discontinued. A number of people live near those post-offices who have always been in the habit of sending and receiving their letters and papers daily. When the free delivery was established they had a better service than they had been used to, but when it is discovered that these rural delivery routes do not handle the requisite number of pieces of mail per month they will be changed from a daily service to a triweekly service, and one carrier will be required to do the work on both routes. Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays he delivers to half of the patrons of the routes and Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays to the other half. Intelligent people living on these routes must be deprived of their daily papers and daily mail or must abandon the rural delivery routes. They can not now turn to their neighborhood post-offices, because they have been abolished, and not being willing to give up their daily mail service, they are forced to send to A, the railroad post-office, many miles from their homes. This would be a great hardship and inconvenience to these people, and it would not help the rural delivery routes. The intelligent people on these routes would not long hesitate to go to the expense and trouble of sending to the post-office for their mail. Their patronage would be withdrawn from the two rural delivery routes, and it would soon be the case that the two routes combined would handle less mail than either one of them did before the change was made, and the carrier would be receiving pay from the Government for rendering less service than he did when he had only one of the routes with a daily delivery.

There can be no doubt about the fact that these people would be in worse position so far as their mail is concerned than they were before this system of rural delivery was inaugurated. [Applause.]

The rural free-delivery service is to-day one of the most popular branches of the Government. The additional expense incident thereto is fully justified by the benefits derived from it by the country people. [Applause.]

Cities and towns have long enjoyed the boon of free delivery of mail and there is no reason why the people of the country districts, even the most remote, should not participate in it. Under the system as at present conducted, the letters, papers, and packages of country people are delivered to them at their very door and at their very door the carrier takes their letters and packages and sends them on to their various destinations. The deliveries in the most remote sections thus brings the people in daily communication with the busy, bustling world. They feel, as it were, the very pulse of the business, political, and social events that are occurring in every portion of the civilized world.

It is a great blessing to farmers in the busy season. The rural delivery of mails enables inhabitants of isolated sections of the country to take advantage of the method of education from daily newspapers and other publications which they have heretofore been deprived of. It enables them to enter into the deliberations of their National Congress and to know what is being done here, and I have heard it suggested that this is the reason Republicans are opposed to it. [Applause.] They can keep up with their State legislature and acquaint themselves with what is going on in the outside world. These are the people who get very few benefits of government. They do not get rich through the medium of special legislation. They pay taxes and bear their share of the burdens of government, and they are entitled to the convenience and advantage the rural free-delivery system gives them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

At the end of line 20, page 27, add: "And provided further, That hereafter the rural mail carriers, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, may be allowed fifteen days' annual leave with pay."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. LEVER. I ask the gentleman to reserve it for two minutes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I must make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In view of the lateness of the hour and the fate of the amendments offered by my colleague from New York I do not want to occupy the time of the House, but I want to put myself on record in regard to the increase of the carriers' pay in the larger cities. Having said that, I will ask the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMYSER. Mr. Chairman, I ask the same leave.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves that debate on the pending paragraph and amendments be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have just offered to the bill is "that hereafter the rural mail carriers, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, may be allowed fifteen days' annual leave with pay."

I very much regret that my friend the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads should interpose a point of order against this amendment. Of course I recognize that the amendment is subject to a point of order, but I recognize also that the only way that we can ever secure any legislation looking to the equalizing of favors among the Government employees is by such an amendment as I propose here. It is for this reason that I so much regret that the point of order has been raised and my friend put in the attitude of standing between the rural carriers and the common justice which belongs to them.

For years bills have been introduced in the House and referred to the Post-Office Committee looking to the end sought by my amendment, but for some reason they have never been reported to the House from that committee.

I call the attention of the House to the fact that the rural carrier, the man who handles the mail for 36,000,000 of our rural population, is the only class of Government employee who does not receive some annual leave of absence with pay. There is not a single private establishment of any consequence in this country which does not give to its employees at least fifteen days during the year with pay. The city mail carrier gets fifteen days each year, the railway mail clerk gets leave under certain conditions, and the hot-house clerk here in Washington, who works seven and a half hours a day at a good salary, not only gets thirty days' annual leave, but thirty days of sick leave with pay. Why this discrimination against the rural carrier? How can we justify our sense of right in permitting the continuance of such a state of affairs?

Who is this man and what are his duties that we have no care for him? He is one of our own citizens whose position has come to him through a competitive examination, and he is entitled to fair treatment, to the same treatment accorded to other employees in the Government. This amendment gives him a mere pittance of justice; he really deserves an increase in salary, and for me I shall vote for the amendment which my colleague [Mr. AIKEN] is about to offer to increase the salary of carriers to $840 a year. I should have offered the amendment myself had I not known that my colleague was going to do so.

The duty of a rural carrier is by no means a snap. He must first stand an examination before he can be appointed; he must pay for his bond and provide himself with equipment necessary to perform the service of a carrier. His first investment, counting the time lost in taking the examination, the cost of bond, and the cost of his horse and buggy, will amount to from three to three hundred and fifty dollars. His annual expense for the feed of his horse and the repair to his buggy and harness can not be less than $250, and out of the remainder of his salary he must live and support and educate his family. It is not enough; and that fact is shown in the 2,582 resignations during last year. Why, Mr. Chairman, we pay the negro Coates, who does the strenuous work of brushing our hats, taking off our coats and rubbers as we come in, and taking charge of them until the session closes, as much as we pay the rural carrier who handles our mail, comes in daily contact with our family, and becomes a part of our daily lives. We pay as much to the negro barbers on the floor below as we give to the rural carrier, and these messengers whose only duty it is to sit at the doors of the various committee rooms receive even a larger salary than the rural carriers. The Government clerk here in Washington, who really works only ten months in the year—and the bulk of that work consists of dreaming of and pleading for higher salaries and shorter hours—receives double the pay of the rural carriers, whose duties in many cases engage them from sun to sun during every workday of the year. There are 35,000 of these men whom we have the hardihood to discriminate against. They are the special servants of the American farmer, whose carrestness, devotion to duty, respect for law and order, and conservatism add so much to the strength of the nation's citizenship. I assert that a day of reckoning is coming. The 36,000,000 people engaged in rural pursuits are going to demand of this Congress sooner or later fair treatment for their "mail boys" who daily bring so much of happiness into their home circles. The carriers' salaries ought to be increased, but I fear the amendment of my colleague [Mr. AIKEN] will suffer the same fate that has come to this amendment of mine, giving to the carriers the mere pittance of fifteen days' annual leave. I beg of the chairman to withdraw his point of order that simple justice may be done this class of employees and that this House may show its willingness to deal fairly with all classes. [Applause.]

[Mr. BENNET of New York addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 20, page 27, add the following: "Provided, That in making selection of carriers three names standing highest on the eligible list shall be certified, should there be that many on such list, and from such three names the appointment may be made."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

The appropriation for the fiscal year 1906 of $25,000 for the employment of special counsel to prosecute and defend suits affecting the second-class mailing privilege is hereby reappropriated and made available for the fiscal year 1907.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to call to the attention of the committee something which has occurred since we voted this subsidy a few moments ago. The gentleman raised the question that the rural carriers were not paid sufficient compensation for their service and that they ought to have something additional for horse hire, as I caught his amendment. This subsidy to this railroad would have paid for 232 new rural routes at $720 a year per carrier, their salary now. I have uniformly voted against this subsidy. It is against good policy and not necessary, and the money should go to build up the rural free-delivery system of the United States.

This railroad can get along without it and serve the people well. It is now a perfect giant. Other railroads having this subsidy have given it up, and they get along without it and keep up their fast schedules. Gentlemen who now talk for rural carriers, etc., voted for this subsidy a few moments ago. I am showing them that "chickens come home to roost." Our rivers and harbors are suffering, too; hence I oppose these subsidies. We could have taken this money and established 232 rural routes, and given that service to the people of this country—to the farmers, that you have never given anything but this delivery service. Nothing has even been taken to their doors but this rural service. They need this money; the railroad does not. They want and need this rural service, yet it is being curtailed, though they petition for it. [Applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of letter carriers and clerks in charge of substations of rural delivery service, $28,200,000: Provided, That not to exceed $15,000 of the amount hereby appropriated may be used for compensation of clerks in charge of substations.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this simply because I want a minute of the attention of the House. Under the civil-service rules, if you are selecting a carrier in the city, the three highest names are certified, and from those the carrier is selected; as to the rural carrier, they can only send up one name. One name that stands at the head of the list is sent up and that prevents them from having any choice at all among the carriers except that one man. Heretofore under the civil service they got a chance to select one out of three, but in this particular service the civil service selects one man and certifies him and him alone.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter no article, package, or other matter shall be admitted to the mails under a penalty privilege, unless such article, package, or other matter would be entitled to admission to the mails under laws requiring payment of postage.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order until there has been some debate on the paragraph.

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 9, on page 28 of the bill, amend by adding the following new paragraph:

"That hereafter, under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may establish for the collections of the lawful revenue and for facilitating the handling of such matter in the mails, it shall be lawful to accept for transmission in the mails quantities of not less than 500 identical pieces of third or fourth class matter, without postage stamps affixed: Provided, That postage shall be fully prepaid thereon at the rate required by law for a single piece of such matter."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, that is contrary to the law of March 13, 1905, and I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter it shall be unlawful for any person entitled under the law to the use of a frank to lend said frank or permit its use by any committee, organization, or association, or permit its use by any person for the benefit or use of any committee, organization, or association.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend on page 27, lines 17 and 18, by striking out the words "twenty-eight million two hundred thousand dollars" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "thirty-two million four hundred thousand dollars: Provided, That not to exceed $4,200,000 of said sum here appropriated shall be paid to rural mail carriers for horse hire and wagon equipment."

Mr. AIKEN. I have offered this amendment to the appropriation for the postal service, increasing the appropriation for the rural service to $32,400,000. I do this in the face of a disposition by Members of this body and by the postal authorities to so limit the appropriation as to hamper the service.

The alleged reason is that the rural service is not self-sustaining, and certain routes through remote settled sections, it is said, must be cut off or reduced to triweeklies because, forsooth, they do not reimburse the Government for the cost of maintaining them. Carriers are expected to serve at starvation salaries on the flimsy pretense that the service is costing too much.

By what standard of measurement is it determined whether or not the Government is reimbursed for its outlay in the rural service? Is it in so many dollars and cents for stamps canceled? Surely not. But let us look at it first from this sordid point of view. The average monthly cancellations of postage stamps by carriers is about 30 per cent of the average pay of carriers. It is stated on good authority that the mail received by the patrons on these routes has been increased several hundred per cent since the establishment of the rural service. Is it not reasonable, then, to suppose that the large increase in mail received is due in a large measure to the establishment of the rural delivery system? And if due to this system, should it not be considered a part of the earning capacity of that system?

But has it been the policy of the Government to measure the utility of a service by the actual dollars reverting through that service to the Public Treasury? Is this the precedent established in voting hundreds of thousands annually for extra fast service on mail trains? Is this the precedent established in paying bonuses to steamship lines for carrying a few pounds of mail to remote and comparatively unimportant points in Central and South America for the accommodation of a few isolated American citizens? Is this the precedent in voting hundreds of thousands of dollars for pneumatic-tube service for the exclusive accommodation of certain sections of this country? Who will contend that the Government revenues are increased one dollar, directly, for ten expended in any one of the ways we have mentioned? Why, then, should we vary the rule when applied to the rural-delivery service? Does it count for nothing that this service is linking in daily communication sections heretofore remote and isolated; and that it is stimulating to a marvelous degree social and business intercourse between country and town? Does it count for nothing that this service dispels in large measure that isolation which makes life in the country less desirable than in populous centers?

If there is one evil greater than all others that threatens the social and business fabric of this nation it is the constant trend toward and the congestion in our cities and towns. The farmer is the only actual wealth creator; all other wealth is but so much margin or profit on his original creation. The Government, then, in using its means without stint in building up an intelligent, contented, and prosperous rural population is planting the seeds of industry where the harvest will be "an hundredfold."

The trolley line and the telephone have done much for the remote rural resident, but the rural service has done more. Not every man is within reach of a trolley line, not every man can afford a telephone, but the humblest citizen may have his mail delivered at his door.

It is my opinion that the rural service has come to stay. Long before the experiment was made in this country, it was well established in monarchical Europe. Since it has taken firm hold on the rural sections of this country of free institutions, will the good people served permit it to be curtailed? Will the Government permit this, the only mite of service to the farmer, almost essential for maintaining the highest type of rural citizenship, to languish for lack of proper support?

I wish now to say a word specifically in behalf of the carriers. At a previous session of Congress I introduced a bill to increase the pay of rural carriers to $900. I have heard no reason since that time why they should not be paid that much or more. It may be stated, without fear of contradiction, that no class of men in the Government service do as much hard work for as little money. There is no reasonable ground on which the Government can justify a parsimonious policy toward these men, whose duties, through winter's snow and summer's scorching heat, are performed with that faithfulness that commands universal admiration.

While I would not take one cent from the pay of city carriers, I wish again in simple justice to call attention to the inequality between their pay and that of rural carriers. City carriers receive $800 and some $1,000 per annum, and in many instances electric-car fare paid, a horse and mail wagon furnished, or the equivalent in money, making some of the salaries about thirteen hundred dollars.

The rural carrier receives $720 at the most, must furnish his horse and buggy and feed his horse, which requires an annual outlay of not less than $250. It has been thoroughly demonstrated that a good horse can not stand constant driving for more than two years, and that a buggy will wear out in that time with constant use needs no demonstration. Placing, then, the annual necessary expense to the carrier at not less than $250, he is expected to ride 25 miles per day, three hundred days in the year, for less than $450. Is there a clerk, of the thousands in the Departments who are asking for more pay and shorter hours, who would exchange places with the rural carrier even with an increase of $500 in the carrier's pay?

About the only argument I have heard advanced against increase of pay of carriers is that men can be had at the present prices, and Government appropriations are now so heavy for matters thought to be more necessary than this minor matter will have to suffer temporary curtailment. If the salary of every office in the United States should be reduced 30 per cent, men could be found to accept them and, perhaps, to fill them acceptably. Would this be any justification for the reduction? In no branch of the public service, from Mexico to Canada, are there so many resignations, proportionately, as occur annually in the rural service. Out of 34,667 carriers serving up to January 2, 1906, there were 2,582 resignations during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905. This is a silent testimonial that speaks volumes of the hard work and poor pay of the carriers.

While my amendment provides for such increase in the appropriation as will warrant salaries of $840 for the carriers, I wish to state that if the shortsighted policy of this body will not grant so much, I shall work or vote for any increase temporarily. I know that in time these deserving men, backed by the farmer who each year is making his strength felt more and more in this nation, will not long knock in vain at the doors of Congress. In the present railroad legislation we find a direct answer to a demand by the individual voter. Scarcely less urgent are the demands by the friends of the rural service, and since they are founded in justice and equity they will eventually triumph. There are no superannuated employees, no requests for pensions, no soft snaps in this branch of the service. [Applause.]

The amendment was ruled out on points of order.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the newspaper clipping which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Special.—By R. M. Larner.]

WASHINGTON, April 8, 1906.

Up in New England and in other sections of the country eminent physicians are recommending the establishment of rural free-delivery mail service as a cure of melancholia and a preventive against suicide.

This startling statement was made a few days ago by P. V. De Graw, Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, who is in charge of the administration of the rural free-delivery branch of the postal service. Mr. De Graw had but a few hours previously completed his monthly report of the division of rural delivery for March. It showed the total number of petitions received for the establishment of rural delivery service, the number of adverse reports, routes in operation one year ago, and the number in operation to April 1, and other details showing the rapid growth and popularity of the rural service.

In commenting upon the popularity and the convenience of the rural service Mr. De Graw recited a number of interesting incidents obtained while making a personal inspection of the system in New England recently. He had occasion to visit the mountain regions of Vermont, and for a brief period enjoyed the companionship of a prominent physician practicing in that locality.

TALKS WITH THE DOCTOR.

While driving through a deserted mountain pass with the doctor, the subject of the rural free-delivery service was discussed from a purely practical point of view. Mr. De Graw is known to be a consistent friend of rural free delivery, and he admits that his friendship is greatly reenforced by the conversation he had with that doctor on that memorable ride and his personal observations along the route. Sometimes they would drive miles and miles without meeting more than one lonely cabin along the road. On two occasions he saw the rural carrier making the daily delivery, and all of the occupants of the cabin came out to greet the ever-welcome visitor.

"There, Mr. Postmaster-General," said the doctor, addressing Mr. De Graw, "is one of the blessings of the rural delivery service. The mail carrier is probably the only traveler along this road for days, and sometimes weeks, that these poor people see or have an opportunity to talk with and get an idea of what is going on beyond the wild and almost deserted region in which they live. Now they have something to look forward to daily—when the rural carrier arrives. Even if he has no mail for them, he stops long enough to speak to them and brighten up their otherwise dormant and uneventful life." This phase of the subject appealed more forcibly to Mr. De Graw when the doctor added:

CURE FOR MELANCHOLIA.

"Not only is rural free delivery a godsend to these people, but it is a cure for melancholia in many instances, and the official statistics of this region and other equally isolated sections of the country show that there has been a great reduction in the number of suicides since rural free delivery became general throughout the country."

That eventful ride led Mr. De Graw to make further investigation on the subject, and he said it is astonishing to learn that so many remote localities have had similar experience and furnish undisputable evidence of the mental, as well as physical, benefit derived from the daily visits of a rural carrier.

PEOPLE TIRED OF LIFE.

Prior to the establishment of rural delivery, dwellers in these sparsely settled and desolate localities were slowly but surely becoming uncivilized because of infrequent contact with the outside world. Loneliness was followed by distress, distress followed by distraction, and distraction induced self-destruction. To-day the rural carrier is a more welcome visitor to the homes of these almost benighted mortals than the country parson or any other State or municipal functionary. It is this condition throughout the rural districts of this country which justifies the most liberal allowances for this comparatively new branch of the postal service.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments be closed.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amend by striking out all of lines 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14, on page 28, and insert the following:

"That hereafter it shall be unlawful for any person entitled under the law to the use of a frank to lend his frank or permit the same to be used by others than himself, or knowingly use, or permit the same to be used, to avoid the payment of postage on unfrankable matter; and any person violating the foregoing provision shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $300, to be recovered in any court having competent jurisdiction: Provided, That the foregoing provisions shall not be construed to prohibit the mailing of frankable matter under the authority of a person entitled to a frank in the interest of any organization, association, or committee of which the person entitled to such frank is in good faith an officer or member."

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

That if the revenues of the Post-Office Department shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations made by this act, a sum equal to such deficiency of the revenue of said Department is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply said deficiencies in the revenues for the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1907.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia will be recognized to offer an amendment.

After line 5, page 29, add following paragraph:

"Hereafter the provision in the rules and regulations of the Post-Office Department, whereby honorably discharged United States soldiers and sailors, though over 55 years of age, are eligible to appointment as carriers on rural free-delivery routes, shall apply to honorably discharged Confederate soldiers and sailors.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move the committee do now rise.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the last line be stricken out. I just want a moment to explain my amendment.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16953—the post-office appropriation bill—and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments to their passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana demands the previous question on the bill and amendments to their final passage.

The question was taken; and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the vote will be taken in gross.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads with instructions to report it back immediately with all between lines 5 and 18 on page 22 stricken out, being the provision for the railroad subsidy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the bill be committed to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads with instructions to report the same forthwith with the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, beginning with line 5, strike out all down to and including line 18.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, to save time I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 96, nays 97, answered "present" 7, not voting 182, as follows:

SENATE.

SATURDAY, April 14, 1906.

The Senate met at 2 o'clock p. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE, offered the following prayer:

On the first Easter Sunday, the same day, at evening when the doors were shut, where the disciples were assembled for fear of the Jews, Jesus came and stood in the midst. "Peace be unto you," He said. "As the Father hath sent me, even so send I you."

Let us pray. Father we do not forget, and we remember the great injunction. He has sent us forth as His servants, as His brethren, and Thy children in Thy name, Father, that we may go forward and build up this world.

Do not let us forget on these sacred days the lessons we have been taught and what the fathers have done for us, and how He lived for us, and died for us, the just for the unjust, that we might be saved.

Father, we ask Thee to bless us in the solemnities of this day. Unless the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it; unless we consecrate all that we do here, all that we say, all that we think, we ask in vain and we labor in vain. This new house we would consecrate to the service of God and the love of man, that we also may build up what has fallen down, that we may open eyes that have been blind, that we may speak the gospel of God's righteousness—yes, to all sorts and conditions of men—first of all, and best of all, that we may be one. "Peace be unto you," He hath said to us, that this world may live at peace, brother with brother, state with state, nation with nation—yes, that the sword may indeed be beaten into a plowshare and that men need study arms no more.

Father, we ask it in His name. Amen.

Our Father who art in Heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is done in Heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us. Lead us not into temptation, But deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom, Thine is the power, Thine is the glory. Forever, Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. KEAN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read, corrected, and approved.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. With the Journal corrected, how does the vote stand on the motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. Ninety-six yeas and 97 nays.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would call the attention of Members to the fact that at 1 o'clock under a special order to-day memorial services in memory of the late Senator PLATT will be held in the House. Since the order was made it has been found out that the probabilities are the House may adjourn at about 2.15 o'clock to witness the laying of the corner stone in the office building. It has been suggested to me by some members of the Connecticut delegation that the memorial services be expedited by fifteen minutes, and that they start at fifteen minutes to 1 instead of at 1 o'clock to enable the finishing of the order by that time. Is there objection to that rearrangement? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 5976) "to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes of the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," and I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

"That the tribal existence and present tribal governments of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes or nations are hereby continued in full force and effect for all purposes authorized by law, until otherwise provided by law, but the tribal council or legislature in any of said tribes or nations shall not be in session for a longer period than thirty days in any one year: Provided, That no act, ordinance, or resolution (except resolutions of adjournment) of the tribal council or legislature of any of said tribes or nations shall be of any validity until approved by the President of the United States: Provided further, That no contract involving the payment or expenditure of any money or affecting any property belonging to any of said tribes or nations made by them or any of them or by any officer thereof shall be of any validity until approved by the President of the United States;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Change the numbering of the last section of the bill to read "Sec. 29."

CHARLES CURTIS,
JNO. H. STEPHENS,
Managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

MOSES E. CLAPP,
P. J. MCCUMBER,
FRED T. DUBOIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement was read, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of House on the disagreeing votes between the Senate and House on Senate amendments to H. R. 5976, "A bill to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," after a full and free conference make the following statement and recommend the adoption of the report by the House:

The House recedes from its disagreement to Senate amendments 1, 4, 6, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 17, 22, 23, 24, 25, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 39, 40, 42, 47, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, and 57.

Amendment No. 1 strikes out the word "formal," and permits the enrollment of persons who file application prior to December 1, 1905.

Amendment No. 4 requires the enrollment of children born up to March 4, 1906.

Amendment No. 6 adds the word "or," and is made necessary by amendment No. 7, which strikes out the words "or Seminole." This tribe is eliminated from the provision of this section on account of all its lands having been allotted.

Amendment No. 9 limits contest as to allotments to six months after the passage of this act.

Amendments Nos. 10 and 11 change the date from June, 1906, to March, 1907.

Amendment No. 12 makes section 7 of the bill more definite and certain.

Amendment No. 13 declares the lands allotted to the freedmen of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes to be "homesteads." This was the intention of the original act.

Amendment No. 17 permits the use of any documentary evidence to show that application for enrollment had been made.

Amendment No. 22 provides for the placing of all records of any land office, if discontinued, in the office of the clerk of the United States court in whose districts said records are now located.

Amendment No. 23 directs that the money expended under section 8 shall be under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Amendment No. 24 strikes out the House provision which authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to take possession of the tribal records, and which provided for the transfer of all cases pending in any tribal court at the dissolution of the tribal government to the United States court in the Indian Territory, and inserted a clause confirming the disbursement of the money due the loyal Seminole Indians by James E. Jenkins, special agent appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and by A. J. Brown, as administrator de bonis non, under the act of Congress of May 31, 1900, and provided that the confirmation should not prevent any individual from bringing suit in his own behalf against the administrator, who had given a bond for the faithful discharge of his duty. As the tribal relations and tribal government, as heretofore, have been continued by joint resolution, your managers thought that legislation could be enacted at the next session of Congress, if necessary, in regard to the disposition of the records of the tribes, and so it receded from its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

Amendment No. 25 authorizes the Court of Claims to adjudicate the claim of Charles F. Winton, deceased, his associates and assigns, against the Mississippi Choctaws.

Amendment No. 30 strikes out two unnecessary words.

Amendment No. 31 strikes out a comma which was not properly used.

Amendment No. 32 changes the word "adjacent" to "abutting."

Amendments Nos. 33 and 34 apply to the coal lands. By the agreement reached between the House and Senate the provision which reserves lands from sale is retained in the bill, but that part which authorizes the Secretary to lease the unleased portion is stricken out. By this agreement the coal lands will remain as they now are, without any authority upon the part of the Secretary of the Interior to either sell or lease them until such time as Congress may think proper to enact legislation in reference to these lands. In view of the importance of the passage of this act at this time, your managers thought it better to enter into this agreement than to further insist upon the House provision, which authorizes the Secretary to make leases of the unleased portion, as it is not likely any great number, if any leases, would have been made by the Secretary if that clause had been retained in the bill.

Amendment No. 35 changes "and" to "or."

Amendments Nos. 36 and 37 change the word "town" to "municipality."

Amendments Nos. 39 and 40 apply to the Murrow Orphans' Home.

Amendment No. 42 adds the words "not less," so as to require that the public buildings and grounds shall be sold at not less than their appraised value.

Amendment No. 47 permits allottees to make rental contracts for not exceeding one year for agricultural purposes for lands other than their homesteads.

Amendment No. 49 permits heirs of deceased Mississippi Choctaws to make final proof of removal and settlement.

Amendment No. 50 strikes out the words "or minors."

Amendments 51, 52, and 53 make section 23 more definite and certain.

Amendment No. 57 declares that any lands which may remain undisposed of upon the dissolution of said tribes shall not become public lands, but shall be held in trust by the United States for the use and benefit of the Indians, respectively, comprising each of the five tribes.

The Senate recedes from its disagreement to amendments 3, 8, 14, 15, 16, 28, 29, 44, and 59.

Amendment No. 3 restores the word "were."

Amendment No. 8 restores the House provision prohibiting a contest as to allotments after the expiration of nine months from the date of the original selection.

Amendment No. 14 restores the words "by blood."

Amendments Nos. 15 and 16 restore the phraseology of the House provisions.

Amendments Nos. 28 and 29 restore the House provisions which require the purchasers of town lots to pay the purchase price due at the date of the passage of this act within sixty days and payments hereafter falling due within thirty days.

Amendment No. 44 restores the language used by the House, which provides that the Secretary of the Interior may bring suits for the tribes.

Amendment No. 59 authorized certain Cherokee allottees to sell a small tract of land to the Delaware band of Indians residing in the Cherokee Nation, to be used for the holding of annual religious festivals and camping purposes. While there was no serious objection to this amendment, yet your managers thought it should be added to some other bill or provided for in a separate measure.

The House receded from its disagreements to the following amendments: Nos. 2, 5, 11, 18, 19, 20, 21, 38, 43, 45, 46, 48, 54, 55, 56, and 58, with certain amendments.

Amendment No. 2, as amended, requires motions to reopen or reconsider any citizenship decision hereafter rendered to be filed within sixty days after the date of the order or decision complained of, and cases heretofore decided within sixty days after the passage of this act.

Amendment No. 5, as amended, strikes out the words "or freedmen."

Amendment No. 18, as amended, provides that if an allottee shall die after restrictions have been removed his property shall descend to his heirs or lawful assigns.

Amendment No. 19 excludes from the provisions of section 5, which provides for the issuance of deeds or patents, any rights involved in contests pending before the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes or the Department of the Interior.

Amendment No. 20 is redrawn so as to make section 6 conform to the other parts of the bill, and with the joint resolution which passed on the 3d day of March, 1906, it also provides for the issuance of deeds by the principal chief of the Seminole tribe before the expiration of the tribal government of that tribe.

Amendment No. 21, as amended, requires the sale of the segregated land, and the pine timber thereon, at public auction or by sealed bids.

Amendment No. 38 authorizes the principal chief of the Choctaw Nation and the governor of the Chickasaw Nation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to issue patents to certain lands to the Murrow Indian Orphan Home, this land having been donated to said home by the tribes and various members.

Amendment No. 43 authorizes each Choctaw and Chickasaw freedman to buy, when the unallotted lands of these tribes are disposed of, enough land to equal, with that already allotted to him, 40 acres in area, said purchase to be at the appraised value.

Amendment No. 45 authorizes the defendant, in any suit brought in behalf of either of the five tribes, to recover money claimed to be due from the said defendant, to set up any claim he may have against said tribe, and to have the same adjudicated in such suit.

Amendment No. 46: This amendment as agreed to in conference virtually restores the House provisions. It requires all oil, gas, and other mineral leases and all agricultural leases for more than one year to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior. It provides that conveyances made by members subsequent to selection of allotment and subsequent to removal of restrictions, when patents thereafter issue, shall not be held invalid solely because said conveyance was made prior to the issuance, recording, or delivery of the patent. It also provides that any deed made before or for which the contract was entered into before the removal of restrictions shall be void. The present law in regard to the alienation of lands by members of the tribes is not changed.

Amendment No. 48 requires all leases for more than one year shall be recorded.

Amendment No. 54 provides that public roads may be established on all section lines in the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole nations.

Amendment No. 55 provides that any light or power company doing business within the limits of the Indian Territory in compliance with the laws of the United States may locate, construct, and operate canals and reservoirs and build dams across nonnavigable streams, the property to be acquired by condemnation, purchase, or agreement, provided that purchases or agreements with individual Indians to whom the right of alienation has not been given shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. All rights granted are subject to the control of the future Indian Territory or State within which the Indian Territory may be situate.

Amendment No. 56 is amended by striking out the Senate provisions extending certain provisions of Wilson's Revisted Statutes of Oklahoma over the Indian Territory, and provides that municipalities in the Indian Territory having a population of over 2,000 may provide for certain improvements of streets and alleys and to make assessments and levy taxes for the purpose of grading and paving the same.

The Senate receded from its disagreement to the following amendments: Nos. 26, 27, and 41, with certain amendments:

Amendment No. 26, which strikes out section 10, is so changed as to restore said section as it passed the House, with an amendment continuing the present tribal educational officers in the schools subject to dismissal by the Secretary of the Interior.

Amendment No. 27 is agreed to, so as to restore the House provision with an amendment providing for the refunding of tribal taxes levied and collected since December 31, 1905.

Amendment No. 41, as restored, provides for the Secretary of the Interior taking possession of the Government buildings of the Five Tribes and to sell them at such time and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

J. S. SHERMAN,
CHARLES CURTIS,
J. H. STEPHENS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. HINSHAW rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. HINSHAW. What disposition does this conference report make of the mineral lands of the Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians?

Mr. SHERMAN. It holds such lands in reservation for future action of Congress.

Mr. HINSHAW. That is to say, they are left as they were before the bill was passed?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; before the bill was passed in the House the Secretary had the right to sell and not to lease. Now the right to sell is taken away except as to existing leases. No disposition is made whatever of the mineral lands.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield four minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have more time than four minutes in which to discuss this matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I can not yield any more time than that, as we take up the special order at a quarter to 1.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, it would be impossible in four minutes to have the House understand the mistake made in this portion of the conference report relating to the mineral lands in the Chickasaw and Choctaw country. This conference report as agreed upon leaves in the hands of the Indians something over 300,000 acres of unleased coal land there. I think there are 111 leases of about 168,000 acres.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LACEY. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. What is the length of these leases?

Mr. LACEY. Some of them have about twenty-seven years yet to run. The remainder of the land is not all coal land, although classified as such. There are about 445,000 acres of classified coal lands, of which something over 100,000 has been leased. It has been leased, I think to a very great advantage, at 8 cents a ton, which runs into a good many hundred dollars an acre. That land was open to lease and sale, but about four years ago, in the act of July 1, 1902 (32 Stat. L., p. 665, sec. 61), we took away from the Secretary the power to lease this land. We now take away also the power to sell it. We have withdrawn from the Secretary the power to sell or the power to lease, and that being done, we give to the present lessees an absolute monopoly of all the coal land in that country until such time as Congress may be induced to break that monopoly. This is done under the claim that we ought not to lease the land for fear of creating a monopoly. Under this apprehension of monopoly we, in fact, create one. The land is leased, some of it, for as long as twenty-seven years, and this provision now as agreed upon—and, I am glad to say, reluctantly by the House managers—puts this land in the hands of the present lessees, with no power to sell any more of it nor to lease any more of it. This, I think, is a great mistake. I think the House proposition, which prevented the sale of the land for the reason that the Indians were getting $250,000 a year or more out of the leases, was a wise one. The further proposition that the present lessees might be prevented from having a monopoly of the sale of coal there by allowing other leases to be made—the other leases to run, according to the House amendments, not to exceed a longer term than the leases now in force—was a wise one. It was just to the Indians. It gave them 8 cents a ton for all the leases that would be made and opened up the balance of the land, so that other coal companies could go in and operate in competition with the existing companies, and I think our conferees ought to have stood on that proposition.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas rose.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield time enough to the gentleman from Iowa to answer any question the gentleman from Texas has to ask.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman if he does not think taking the rest of the land upon lease would have resulted in a few coal companies getting possession of all that land?

Mr. LACEY. Not at all. There are over 300,000 acres of the land that we have tied up absolutely so as to prevent competition.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this conference report should go over and come up on Monday. There is no reason why it should be rushed through here in four minutes.

These coal lands belong to the Indians, and under the regulations of the Secretary of the Interior were being leased in tracts of 960 acres each, at 8 cents a ton. Under these leases the Indians are receiving about $250,000 a year. It is very desirable that the Indians should have the full advantage of these leases, and the bill as it passed the House kept the leases alive, the royalty going to the benefit of the Indians.

The leases already made have been carefully guarded by the Secretary of the Interior, and any additional leases ought to be limited to the same period now covered by existing leases.

It is unjust to the Indians to deny them the income which the working of the additional mines would produce, and it is greatly to the disadvantage of the people in that country to limit all coal working to the leases now in existence, thus giving a monopoly to the present lessees.

That is all the more objectionable if it is done under the assumption that the prevention of the leasing and mining of this coal is in the interest of the consumer of coal. The provisions of the House bill were just to the Indians, because the bill authorized the use of the coal to the profit of the Indians. It was just to the people in that country because it would have increased the competition in mining.

The Department of the Interior in making leases provides against monopoly by limiting the area leased to any one mining company or association. These leases always provide for a minimum royalty, so that leases can not be used merely to tie up the land.

Certainly it is to be hoped that the "further action of Congress" contemplated in the amendment of the Senate may not result in mere delay and postponement to the prejudice of the Indians, of whom Congress is the guardian, or to long-continued monopoly in the present lessees.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCGUIRE].

Mr. MCGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be understood as opposing the conference report upon this bill, but I desire to call the attention of the House to that portion of section 19 relating to the alienation of Indian lands in the Indian Territory which has been stricken out. The policy of the Government for the last twenty years has been such as to build up in that country a great system of tenantry. I am opposed to that sort of a system——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The system of what?

Mr. MCGUIRE. Tenantry. The best farmer, as a rule, is the farmer who owns his own land. The best farmer will own his own land. If the full-blood Indian and the half-breed or mixed-blood Indians in that country were permitted to sell their land down to 40 acres or down to their homestead, there would be a different story to tell as to the conditions in the Indian Territory in the very near future.

We speak of them as full-blood Indians. There are a few, not many. The Indian of that country if he had the opportunity, if he had by his side the kind of farmer you have in the States of Kansas, Missouri, Iowa, or other States in the Union, where the farmer owns his own soil and cultivates his own farm, there is no reason why the Indian should not be as far advanced in this enterprise as his white neighbor. He has by his side, however, the men who come there to lease, who remain in that community for one year, perhaps not longer than one year. He does not remain because conditions are unsettled and land can not be had. He does not build, beautify, and improve, because it is the property of another. He may be the best citizen, but he can not reap the reward of his labors and he moves on. I say, Mr. Speaker, if we should allow these people to dispose of everything but their homestead, the best citizenship of the country would go to the Indian Territory, and go to stay. In that way you could organize schools. As long as you prevent the Indian from selling his land there is no way to organize school districts for these people. There are large sections of the country now in Oklahoma where we have failed to remove the restriction upon the Indians where there is not a single school district or any school organization, the reason being that there is no taxable property upon which to levy a tax sufficient to support a common school system. The same condition prevails throughout the Indian Territory except in the towns and cities. There is little taxable real estate, vastly insufficient from which to derive a sum that would be required to support a school system. Hence more than 100,000 school children in the Indian Territory, including whites and mixed bloods, are without school advantages. This condition would be remedied and its difficulties obviated by the alienation of the land now belonging to the Indian in excess of his homestead, and there comes no word of objection from those peple. They are all of one universal sentiment. The white man and the Indian from that country alike agree that from a moral, commercial, and educational point of view these restrictions should be removed. In many respects the person of Indian blood is no different from the white man. The average citizen is not quick to take on physical or mental burdens unless it becomes a necessity. The Indian can work and will work if he finds it necessary so to do, and the most healthful, the best civilized, and the most progressive Indians of Oklahoma and Indian Territory at this time are those who have long since had taken from them by the Government of the United States their support. Reasonable and proper assistance should be extended. But it should stop there. There is no Indian who will need immediate revenues more than the aged Indian of that country of to-day. The younger men of those tribes have had the advantages of education. They are abundantly capable of coping with their white neighbor in any and every particular. But it is the Indian advanced in years who is without education and without means of support who, if he had the proceeds of his land at this time, aside from his homestead, would live in comparative ease and comfort during the balance of his days.

My attention has been called to the remarks and observations of a citizen of that country who has had every opportunity to observe for a great number of years the condition of the Indians, the white man, and the people in general. I refer to Col. Clarence B. Douglas. Mr. Douglas is a distinguished citizen of that Territory; editor of the Muskogee Phoenix, the leading paper of the Indian Territory; colonel of the Territorial militia; president of the Inter-Territorial Editors' Organization, and has given much thought and study to conditions; and in a recent communication to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, he says:

> The occasion of my visit here at this time is that provision formerly in the Five Civilized Tribes bill removing the restrictions from the alienation of Indian allotted land, which last week was stricken from the bill.
> Since my arrival I have become convinced that in this bill the desired legislation so necessary to the development of Indian Territory can not be incorporated, and am therefore working along other lines. Discussing what this would mean to the three-quarters of a million people I desire to say:

The law-making departments at Washington seem to have altogether the wrong idea as to what is best for the Indian Territory, and persist in treating that country as though it was a blanket Indian reservation where all business had to be carried on through an interpreter. As a matter of fact, the members of the Five Civilized Tribes are perhaps better educated in percentage than the white people of some of the States of the Union. It is also a matter of fact the Indians, except full bloods of the Five Civilized Tribes, are as competent to take care of themselves as the average American.

Under the existing treaties 20,000,000 acres of land has been allotted in severalty to 90,000 Indians by blood, adoption, and intermarriage, less than 15 per cent of whom are Indians of full blood. To each of these Indians two patents have been issued, one for a homestead consisting of from 40 to 160 acres in the different tribes, which land is inalienable for twenty-one years. The remainder of their respective allotments, ranging from 120 acres to 400 or 500 acres, is termed their "surplus allotment," and under the provisions of the Five Civilized Tribes bill as originally drawn, as passed by the House, and as passed by the Senate, this could be alienated except as to minors and except as to full bloods. For some reason not apparent this provision has been stricken from the bill, and the result has been a stampede for the entire business interests, Indians and whites alike, of the entire Territory.

An Indian can not and will not farm his entire allotment, and if he can't dispose of a portion of it he remains nonself-supporting, and though he may have in a landed estate an apparent asset of thousands of dollars, in practice he is a pauper, unable to improve even his homestead and unable to farm any portion of his excess allotment. The result is, and will continue to be, that the Indian is pauperized and that he does not realize on his allotment as he is entitled to. Under the present system only tenants can occupy the land. This means a shiftless, irresponsible population driving into the country from Texas and Arkansas at the beginning of the crop season in a covered wagon with a run-down mule and a sway-backed pony, and a verbal contract is made with the Indian to raise a crop on the shares. This tenant then goes to town, mortgages his crop in advance, figures how much he can get from the merchant, scratches the soil a little during the summer, burns up the rail fences, makes no permanent improvements on the place himself, and when the crop season is gone by is necessarily broke because he has raised nothing. He blows his horn for the hounds, throws his few belongings into a covered wagon and moves to some other section of the country, and the Indian has received another lesson in the duplicity of the white man. He goes to the corncrib or the cotton gin to get his rent and he finds that the merchant has it plastered with a mortgage exceeding in value everything raised on the place. The land is poisoned by weeds and cockleburs, nobody is benefited, and the country has one more year of depression.

With the removal of the restriction, as was contemplated by the House and Senate when they acted on the bill, all of these things would be changed. The white farmer would come into the country from Iowa, Indiana, Illinois, Nebraska, and Ohio, and he would come not as a traveling tenant, but as a prospective purchaser, as a man desiring to be a landlord. The Indian would put his surplus land on the market—the best real-estate market the world has ever known—and for it get probably more than its value. By the size of his 160 acres a good farmer would begin to carve him out a home. He would build a house, dig a well, plant a rosebush, nail a picket on the fence, and the Indian by the example would learn to do the same thing. In the next few years the Indian's remaining homestead would be more valuable to him in dollars and cents than his entire allotment is at this time. Not only would this be a benefit to the country, but it would teach the Indians a new lesson from the white man. It would give him a new idea of the white man; it would make him say to his boys and girls: "This white man we can afford to follow. This white man has not tried to do us out of something." The ultimate result would be the amalgamation of the boys and girls, Indians and whites, of the respective neighborhoods, the amalgamation of the races, and the practical, sensible, intelligent solution of the Indian question in the Indian Territory.

My mission here at this time is to endeavor to impress these facts on the minds of our national legislators. Their impulses, I believe, are altogether right. I know from twenty-two years association with the people of that country that their theories are altogether wrong. I know that no prosperity can come to any country relying on a tenant class of citizenship. I know the Indian will have little confidence in the white race so long as present conditions continue. I know that if in the Indian appropriation bill or some other pending legislation Congress will remove the restrictions from the adopted citizen, the intermarriage citizens, the citizen of less than full blood, except as to homesteads and except as to minors, that they can bring to that country the greatest era of prosperity and the greatest possible good to the greatest number. I know if they fail to do this they will bring to our business life stagnation, bankruptcy, and the continuation of affairs that ought never to have been permitted to exist in the heart of the American Republic.

I do not know just how long I will remain in Washington. I do not know that I shall stay until every resource at my command has been exhausted, but I do know that no more important legislation, not even statehood for Oklahoma and Indian Territory, is pending at this time than that in which I am so intensely interested.

It was a sacrifice for me to come to Washington, as it has been many times before. The novelty of this city, beautiful as it is, has worn off years ago, but in a matter affecting the destinies of so many people I felt as though I owed it to myself, and to the Indians no less than to the whites, to make this trip, and on this trip to make a last-ditch fight for that which I consider to be so vitally necessary for their future prosperity. We are building a State down there. It will come into the Union on the stroke of a clock. We want a good class of citizens there to begin with, the honest sturdy farmers, not the shiftless, irresponsible, chronic mover. This is more important to the Indian than to the white man, and almost a million helpless people are looking to you for protection in this matter.

The foregoing, in my judgment, is a clear, concise, and accurate statement of the conditions in that country, and contains suggestions which ought to be adopted and placed in this bill. A magnificent country, with unlimited natural resources, thrifty and energetic people, waiting for an opportunity which can only be given them by this branch of the Government and which, if it should be given them, would result in a most remarkable development. That which the people of the Indian Territory have accomplished has not been because of assistance which they have had, but rather in spite of the obstacles which they have had to encounter. Every possible burden has been laid upon the business men, and every impediment has been thrown in the way of progress, all upon the theory that the Indian should be protected. The Indian has his protection when you have given him his homestead. Allow him, if you please, to alienate his surplus lands, give him the money with which to improve that which he must retain, and you have not only sufficiently protected the Indian, but you have given every industry of that country an incentive which will grow and expand it, and it will only be a question of a few short years when the mistakes in the past government of the Indian Territory will be apparent to every white man and Indian alike.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I would like to have a few minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas two minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that I am in full accord with the gentleman from Oklahoma on the question of permitting the Indians to manage their own affairs, and I state further that unless the restrictions be removed from the lease and sale of Indian lands in the Indian Territory that the country will be held back indefinitely; and the policy pursued by the present Secretary of the Interior in withholding from sale and lease the Indian lands—from the Indians competent to manage their own affairs—has been the very worst policy that could have been pursued during the years since the present Secretary has had this great power placed in his hands by Congress. One object in this bill, Mr. Speaker, was to prevent the sale and disposal of the 445,000 acres of coal lands in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indian Territory. I regard the prevention of the sale and lease of the coal deposits as one of the most important features of legislation before this present Congress; and for years I have been contending that the title to these coal lands should be preserved in the United States Government and that the royalty arising from the leasing of the coal mines should be permanently kept for a school fund for the future State government.

Mr. Speaker, the provision in this bill relative to the coal and asphalt lands, agreed upon by the committee, is as follows:

SEC. 13. That all coal and asphalt lands, whether leased or unleased, shall be reserved from sale under this act until the existing leases for coal and asphalt lands shall have expired or until such time as may be otherwise provided by law.

This provision leaves this question open for future legislation by Congress. I desired legislation by this Congress on this subject and favored the following amendment to the section 13, above quoted:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to ascertain and report by the opening of the next session of Congress if he can secure an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indian tribes to have said coal lands set aside for school purposes, or report a plan for the sale and disposition of said lands.

Mr. Speaker, if this amendment had been adopted, an agreement could have been made with these Indians to transfer these coal lands to the future State of Oklahoma for school purposes in consideration of the $5,000,000 appropriated in the statehood bill as a school fund for Oklahoma.

Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a resolution which should become a law, and these coal lands would by its enactment be preserved for a permanent school fund. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the deposits of coal and asphalt in the segregated coal and asphalt lands heretofore set apart in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, Indian Territory, may be purchased by the United States from the said Indian tribes at a sum not to exceed $5,000,000, and when so purchased said deposits shall become a part of the permanent school fund of the State in which the land containing said deposits may become a part. Said deposits of coal and asphalt shall be leased on such royalty as the legislature of such State may from time to time designate and in quantities not to exceed 960 acres to one person or corporation, and any leases of said deposits shall become void and of no effect whenever any lessees shall unlawfully combine among themselves or with any common carrier, either directly or indirectly, to control the prices of any coal or asphalt mined from said deposits of coal or asphalt; and no railroad company shall be permitted to lease or operate any mine on said segregated coal or asphalt lands, or to deal in any way with the output of said mines, save as they may lawfully do as common carriers only.

The President of the United States is hereby directed to negotiate an agreement with said Indian tribes providing for the transfer of said coal and asphalt deposits to the permanent school fund of the State that may be formed hereafter in said Indian Territory. Said coal and asphalt deposits shall be subject to be leased only by the legislature of such State, the proceeds arising therefrom to be used in said State as a common school fund only. The money arising from the sale of said deposits of coal and asphalt shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and held for the use and benefit of said Indian tribes.

The President of the United States shall, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, sell, in lots not to exceed 160 acres to one purchaser, all of the surface land in said segregated coal and asphalt district, said sales to be made either at public auction or under sealed bids as he may direct to the highest bidder therefor, and the proceeds arising from said sale shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and held for the use and benefit of said Indian tribes.

Mr. Speaker, if this resolution should become a law, the money derived from the leasing of these coal lands would furnish a permanent and large school fund for the future State of Oklahoma. I believe that the surface of these coal lands should be sold and the money paid to the Indians, and the coal and asphalt deposits under these lands should never be sold, but always leased, so that this, the greatest and best deposit of coal in the Southwest, would, if my resolution should become a law, be left under the future control of the State of Oklahoma; and its legislature could declare any leases void if a trust to control prices should be formed in that country. Such a trust is now operating there, because the existing leases, made by the Secretary of the Interior, do not contain any clause that would prevent the lessees from so combining as to control prices.

Mr. Speaker, the State of Texas is tributary to this coal field, and our people are vitally interested in preventing these coal lands from passing into the hands of coal combines; and I hope that this or a future Congress may be induced to pass my bill or a similar one.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is of great importance to the people of the Indian Territory. We have prevented the tribal governments from levying or collecting any taxes from the white citizens of that Territory. I have done all in my power to remove restrictions from the sale or lease of Indian lands, and the measure we have reported does not meet my views; but it was the best we could get at this time or in this bill.

The work of enrolling these Indians has been about completed under existing laws. I know that a great wrong has been done hundreds of Indian families by this Government in refusing them enrollment. I have for years done everything in my power to enroll every Indian entitled to enrollment.

A total of 91,637 persons have been enrolled as citizens of the different nations composing the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians in the Indian Territory, according to the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs at the close of the fiscal year of the Government.

This number includes only approved names that have been submitted to and passed upon by the Department of the Interior. The citizens are classified as follows:

Choctaws by blood, 15,898; Choctaws by intermarriage, 1,467; Choctaw freedmen, 5,254; children born to Choctaw citizens since September 25, 1902, and prior to March 4, 1905, 1,262; Mississippi Choctaws, 1,235. Chickasaws by blood, 4,956; Chickasaws by intermarriage, 598; Chickasaw freedmen, 4,995; children born to Chickasaw citizens since September 25, 1902, and prior to March 4, 1905, 518. Creeks by blood, 10,010; Creek freedmen, 5,585; children born to Creek citizens since May 25, 1901, and prior to March 4, 1905, 153. Cherokees by blood, 32,604; Cherokee freedmen, 3,982; Cherokee Delawares (registered Delawares), 196. Seminoles by blood, 1,899; Seminole freedmen, 857; children born to be enrolled Seminole freedmen prior to March 4, 1905, 93. Total, 91,637.

Only 1,235 applicants for identification as Mississippi Choctaws have complied with the provisions of law and been enrolled, but 2,274 applications have been approved. The Delawares born since the register of 1867 was made have been enrolled on the regular rolls of citizens of the Cherokee nation as Cherokee citizens of Delaware blood.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, just a word. There is urgent necessity for the immediate passage of this bill. It should have been made a law long ago. The administrative work of the Department has been greatly delayed by the long consideration of the committee of conference and I do not want another single day to elapse without this bill being in the hands of the President. We have considered it fully and it is a unanimous report. It does not contain every single item desired—I have never known a bill to come in which did—but it is the best we, the House conferees, could procure. As far as the coal lands and mineral properties are concerned, nobody is injured, because everything is left in statu quo for the future action of Congress. A full removal of the restriction on alienation is not in the interest of the Indians at this time. I now move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the previous question will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The question was taken; and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF IOWA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 16014) to amend an act entitled "An act to create the southern division of the southern district of Iowa for judicial purposes, and to fix the time and place for holding the court therein, approved June 1, 1900, and all acts amendatory thereof," with Senate amendments, which were read.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

MEMORY OF HON. ORVILLE HITCHCOCK PLATT.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, the hour having arrived for the exercises, I send to the Clerk's desk the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That, in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of the Hon. ORVILLE HITCHCOCK PLATT, late a Senator from the State of Connecticut.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished career and his great service to his country as a United States Senator, the House, at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings of this day, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The question was taken; and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, death dealt very harshly with the State of Connecticut during the year just passed. It removed from us two of our noblest and truest men when Senator JOSEPH R. HAWLEY and Senator ORVILLE H. PLATT were called to that land "whence no man returneth." The death of the brilliant soldier and statesman, General HAWLEY, was a hard blow, but not unexpected. We were prepared for that. But within a month of Senator HAWLEY'S death our senior Senator was suddenly stricken down at the height of his career and usefulness to the State. The death of Senator PLATT, so unexpected, so sudden, and following so closely the death of Senator HAWLEY, cast a gloom over the entire State, and they were mourned in almost every home.

The life and political career of Hon. ORVILLE HITCHCOCK PLATT demonstrates what persistency, common sense, and honesty will accomplish. When Senator PLATT was first elected to the Senate in 1879, he was not a national figure. Indeed, his fame had hardly spread outside of his own State. True, he had been honored by his fellow-citizens with many offices. He was known and respected as an honest, hardworking man of recognized ability, but only his most intimate friends dared to predict that in time he would become one of the leaders of the United States Senate and of the whole country.

His growth in power and influence was not a sudden one. It was steady, slow, but sure. For twenty years of his Senatorial life he was unconsciously preparing himself for the great responsibilities that awaited him as chairman of the Committee on Cuban Affairs. By attending faithfully to his duty, by never swerving one iota from the path he believed to be right, Senator PLATT gained the confidence and esteem of his colleagues in the Senate. More and more, with each passing year, his advice was sought, until he was reckoned among the leaders in the upper branch of Congress.

Still for these many years the country at large knew but little of the senior Senator from Connecticut. His modesty and his retiring disposition stood in his way. He cared nothing for the transient fame that most men strive for. He sought and obtained the high regard of his own colleagues, the best judges of his ability. So when the serious problems growing out of the Spanish war confronted us, especially with regard to the future of Cuba, it was no surprise to those who had watched Senator PLATT for twenty years to find that upon him devolved the task of solving the complex question of our relations with the island of Cuba. As chairman of the Committee on Cuban Affairs Senator PLATT made himself thoroughly familiar with the work in hand, as he always did. The Platt amendment, which practically insures to Cuba a free and stable government, stands to-day as a monument to his statesmanship and his skill as a legislator.

The passage of that amendment made Senator PLATT a famous man throughout the world. He had at last come into his own, and the country acknowledged him as one of its greatest men. He seemed to grow from that time on with rapid strides. Again the country heard of him as the presiding officer of the Swayne impeachment trial last session. With dignity, with fidelity, and with impartiality he attended day after day to this arduous duty, and the end of the long struggle found him worn-out, ill, but brave to the last. Even then no one suspected that he would be called so soon. His devotion to duty, his avidity for work, finally got the better of him and laid him low at the very zenith of his career.

While for many years Senator PLATT worked faithfully as a national legislator without securing the recognition due him from the nation at large, we of Connecticut knew and honored him. Indeed he served longer than any other Connecticut man in the Senate. His first election, in 1879, was a long-drawn-out struggle, but four times since then he was the unanimous choice of the Republicans in our legislature. It was indeed the greatest tribute the people of Connecticut could pay him. No matter who were elected to the legislature year after year, the voters demanded the retention of Senator PLATT, and none dared, nay even wished, to oppose him.

It was no wonder that Senator PLATT was beloved and honored by the State in which he lived practically all his life. He was distinctly a son of Connecticut. Born in Washington, among the beautiful hills of Litchfield County, July 19, 1827, he spent his entire life in the State, with the exception of a few months in Pennsylvania. In 1851 Senator PLATT opened a law office in Meriden, and then began, by slow degress, his growth and his political career, which finally culminated in the United States Senate. In 1853 he was elected judge of probate of Meriden, the first political office he held. He was one of the founders of the Republican party in Connecticut, in 1856, and in 1857 was elected secretary of state. In 1861–62 he served in the State senate. Two years later he was a member of the lower house and chairman of the judiciary committee. Five years after that he was again a member of the house and chosen its speaker. When he retired from that office he was known and respected throughout the State, and even then he was looked upon as the coming statesman of Connecticut.

For some time, however, Senator PLATT retired from politics to devote himself to his increasing law practice. It was not until 1877 that he again held office. He was then appointed State attorney for New Haven County, which position he held until elected to the Senate. Such, in brief, was the history of the political life of Senator PLATT. In all these various offices he displayed the wonderful energy, common sense, and capacity for work which finally brought him such renown and honor. Never a breath of scandal tainted his life. His honesty was never questioned. What he believed to be right he did, and he never curried popular favor. Throughout his busy life he continued the even tenor of his way, looking always straight ahead, never caring one iota for public praise or censure. He knew he always did his duty as he saw it, and he felt confident the people, who showered political honors upon him, would rightly estimate the spirit and value of his work. And they did.

To me personally Senator PLATT was particularly close. We were within nine days of the same age, and for fifty years we had been together in all the struggles of the Republican party in Connecticut. I was proud to call myself one of his intimate friends, and to be on the same side with him in our political battles. I loved him, honored him, and esteemed him. His loss was to me a personal one, and he left a vacancy in my heart that no man can fill. His memory will ever remain very dear to me, as it also will to all who knew him well.

The private life of Senator PLATT was clean, straightforward, and honest. His habits were exemplary; yes, frugal. He was a man who cared not for show. His tastes were simple, and he loved God's nature. When rich in years and honors he still longed for the simple life of the little country town among the hills where he was born, and to it he returned to live and to die. Here in the early spring he breathed his last, almost on the very spot where he first saw the light of day. How fitting that a man of his temperament should be born and die among the hills and scenes he loved so well!

To the people of his native town he was always a neighbor, not a distinguished Senator, and he took an active interest in their affairs, small as they were, compared to the questions with which he was accustomed to deal. And here, on a beautiful spring day, the last sad rites were performed. Here he was laid to rest in the pretty little cemetery on the hill. It was an impressive ceremony in its simplicity. To the little country church his remains were borne upon the shoulders of his neighbors—farmers—who had known him all their lives. Here there were no flowery funeral orations, no show, simply the devoted and silent tribute of friends and neighbors. Distinguished men from the United States Senate and House, high State officials, and members of the legislature all bowed their heads in heartfelt grief as the simple words of the Gospel lesson were read.

With bared heads all followed in the procession to the cemetery. A few more words of prayer and all that was earthly of ORVILLE H. PLATT was laid to rest.

May his memory ever remain fresh in our minds and in our hearts! May his life teach to our young men a lesson of honesty, of integrity, of devotion to duty, and of simplicity, for all these made him a great and noble man!

Of him can truthfully be said: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, situated among the lower ranges of the beautiful Green Mountains, in one of the most charming spots of old New England, is the picturesque town of Washington, in the State of Connecticut, unsurpassed for its scenic beauty, inhabited by descendants of the Puritans. Here lies all that is earthly of our honored and beloved statesman, scholar, and patriot, ORVILLE HITCHCOCK PLATT.

When his great spirit took its flight, not only did every right-minded inhabitant of our proud Commonwealth feel that they had suffered an irreparable loss, but the people of this great Republic, realizing that he belonged to them almost as much as to Connecticut, mourned with us. We rise above our sorrow with a quickening of mingled pride and pleasure to recall this true son of the Puritans as he labored in our midst, a man of the highest abilities, with a sterling, noble character.

The high office to which our people, through their chosen representatives, elevated him and which he had filled with so much grace and such marked ability, came to him unsought. At the expiration of his first and each succeeding term he was the unanimous choice of his party, the value of his life's work having been the more appreciated by his native State as the years rolled by, the zenith of his power ever rising without a wane, until grim death halted the upward course.

Senator PLATT was a statesman in all that word implies and in its fullest sense, possessing that keen perspective faculty of looking far into the future, foretelling with accuracy the result of legislation. Always with the best interests of his beloved State paramount, he never failed to accord due and careful consideration to every issue of the Republic as a unit and to her every citizen, believing in legislation resulting in the greatest good to the greatest numbers, and when he was called to that "land which is fairer than day" there was left a void in that great coordinate branch of this Government which will not soon be filled.

His faith in the people and in our form of government was remarkable and abiding, especially in the Senate, where he had devoted nearly a generation so industriously, so assiduously, so unceasingly. He believed that the Senate as at present constituted contained as able, forceful debaters, as powerful orators, and men as fearless, as honest, and with as great intellectual minds as it ever contained since the foundation of the Government. Calling upon him one evening during the last Congress, as was my custom, for instruction and inspiration, I recall his saying that he had just listened to a speech by one of his colleagues which, in his opinion, was the equal, if not the superior, of any that had ever been uttered upon the floor of that Chamber.

His farsighted statesmanship was neither a gift of nature nor a lucky stroke of chance, but the logical outcome of a mind such as was his, analytical and constructive, devoted to thorough investigation of facts and precedents.

The very life of Senator PLATT all vies and blends with his intellectual attainments. His life was simplicity itself—kind, gentle, unassuming, thoughtful only of others, never of self; ever doing good, loving his fellow-men, honoring God, and serving his country with all his might, all his soul, all his strength.

Let us hope that this typical old New England type of manhood may ever stand preeminently before our young men of Connecticut and of our whole country as an ideal, attaining which all the world will say, "His life was a success."

I can not refrain (if I may be pardoned for speaking of myself) from expressing my keen personal loss, our relations being of the most friendly character. Frequently I went to him, as a child to his father, for advice and guidance, and though oftentimes impeding his constant labors he always welcomed me as a father his son, and never did I leave without feeling benefited and inspired with a clearer understanding.

As we pay our last tribute to such a worthy life, there is sweet solace in the thought that Connecticut loves and honors him, and will ever cherish and revere his memory.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, when the thirteen English colonies in North America confederated to resist the oppressive laws and unjust taxation imposed by the mother country, the colony of Connecticut sent Roger Sherman, Silas Dean, and Eliphalet Dyer as Representatives to the first Continental Congress. Subsequently the colony was represented by Oliver Wolcott, Samuel Huntington, William Williams, and Roger Sherman, signers of the Declaration of Independence. After the adoption of the Federal Constitution the State was represented in the early Congresses by Oliver Ellsworth, William Samuel Johnson, Roger Sherman, and Jonathan Trumbull, historic names which still have power to stir the hearts of all patriotic sons of Connecticut.

In later years Connecticut has been served in the Senate of the United States by many brilliant and able men—Niles, Baldwin, Smith, Toucey, Gillett, Foster, Dixon, Ferry, Eaton, Hawley, PLATT, all notable and distinguished names in the story of American history.

The last of these, whose memory we commemorate and honor to-day, surpassed all his predecessors in length of service, and was the peer of any upon that roll of illustrious statesmen, who for more than a century have graced the Senate and honored the State they represented.

ORVILLE HITCHCOCK PLATT was first elected to the United States Senate in 1879, and served continuously for twenty-six years; four times reelected without opposition within his party, he was easily the most popular statesman of his generation in the State he loved and served. Always frankly expressing his views upon pending political issues and current events, he preferred to lead rather than follow public opinion; sometimes criticised by political opponents and less far-seeing men, he patiently awaited the vindication the future invariably brought. His thorough comprehension of apparently difficult economic and political problems, his faculty for forecasting and initiating original definite policies (well illustrated by the amendment bearing his name attached to legislation defining our relations with Cuba) gave him high rank as a constructive statesman and inclined other men of inferior perceptive faculties to defer to his judgment and accept his leadership.

Perhaps no higher compliment can be paid to his superior inductive powers than to say that his leadership was never a disappointment; his friends, his constituents, his colleagues in the Senate, as well as high officials of the nation, ever found in him a wise and safe adviser.

Senator PLATT was of the best Puritan lineage. His paternal ancestor, first settler Richard Platt, was, in 1638, one of the founders of New Haven colony, his name being upon the first assessment list of that colony. "Goodman" Platt, as he was styled in the quaint language of the period found in the colonial records, was in sympathy with the views of the Rev. John Davenport, of most pious memory, a Puritan of the strictest faith, who, regarding the Massachusetts Bay, Plymouth, and Connecticut colonists as lax in civil and ecclesiastical methods, led his followers to the founding of a new colony upon the shores of Long Island Sound, where he earnestly labored to establish a purely religious commonwealth, governed in accordance with scriptural teachings, an ideal theocratic republic where church discipline and civil government should remain inseparable.

It is doubtful if history can afford a higher hereditary title of true nobility than is presented by the descendants of these iron-willed, stout-hearted, freedom-loving, stalwart Christians of three centuries ago, who planted the beginnings of empire upon the inhospitable soil of New England.

Possibly influenced by inherited mental tendencies, yet such Puritanism as Senator PLATT possessed was broadened and made tolerant by his Christian charity and kindly regard for all of God's creatures; he loved his fellow-men, and they repaid his self-sacrificing devotion by unquestioning confidence and respect.

The son of a plain Connecticut farmer, of a class to be found in most New England towns, the best blood of the land, and more than any other portion of our people, the founders and builders of the Republic, young ORVILLE H. PLATT encountered the difficulties attendant upon his humble early environments, but with virile energy, transmitted through a long line of sturdy ancestors, the Yankee boy fought his way to manhood, success, and ultimate fame. Triumphantly overcoming all obstacles, he acquired a fundamental education equal to the exigencies and requirements of a long and distinguished career. Poor in pocket, but rich in a determination to make his way in the world, he entered upon the practice of his chosen profession, and almost immediately secured favorable recognition as a sound and able lawyer. Soon called to political preferment, Senator PLATT's ability, tact, and honesty, in public as in private life, commanded the confidence not only of his immediate constituents, but of the people of the entire State. His wisdom grew and kept pace with his experience, and ripened into statesmanship which year after year more and more gained him popular favor, increased his power for good, and won him national recognition until his fame and reputation was even broader than our national boundaries.

In resolutions adopted by the Connecticut general assembly, immediately after Senator PLATT's decease, it was accurately stated:

"Connecticut people have with ever-increasing appreciation followed his course of steady and substantial growth and development to the commanding position of influence which he exercised at the seat of government, and the feeling of our people toward ORVILLE H. PLATT, as in his advancing years he still bore the heat and burden of the day in the discharge of his responsible duties can not be measured by mere appreciation and respect, but was and is more akin to love, and the memory of his simple and winning personality, and his earnest devotion to the interests of the State and country will long linger in the memory of a grateful people."

In this place and presence it is superfluous to refer to the well-known fact that few men possessed greater influence with the last and present national Administrations than Senator PLATT. President Roosevelt, alike with President McKinley, frequently sought and followed the advice of Connecticut's senior Senator, at all times finding in him a statesman of trained intellect, and skilled experience, a counsellor whose wisdom never failed. His frank, decisive manner, clear-headed views, and comprehensive grasp of all public questions inspired conviction and fixed the judgment of all who sought his confidence or came within the scope of his influence.

Upon occasion reticent with strangers, but affable and approachable, Senator PLATT was always genial to his friends; often optimistic, he rarely indulged in pessimistic views, and when other men of less firm faith in God's providence were doubtful of the future, and inclined to despair of the Republic, he, with hopeful trust in our country's destiny, remained safely anchored to his positive altruistic convictions.

Fortunately blessed with a long and untrammeled mental development, he in the fullness of years, in complete possession of every intellectual power, with pristine vigor unimpaired, passed to his reward.

Mr. HIGGINS. Mr. Speaker, following a long-established practice, it is eminently fitting that this House pause at times in its usual deliberations for reflection and pay just tribute and offer eulogy to those whose lives in this forum have been spent in eminent service to their country.

So we this day set aside the usual duties that would occupy us to honor the memory of ORVILLE HITCHCOCK PLATT, for twenty-six years an honored and distinguished Senator from Connecticut. A service for more than a quarter of a century in the highest legislative body in the world speaks for itself of loyalty to State and fidelity to trust.

It was not my privilege to have known and associated with Senator PLATT as a colleague, but as one in his own State, among his own people, by whom he was greatly loved and trusted. The people of Connecticut were justly proud of him.

Senator PLATT possessed the virtues of integrity, industry, and a fine sense of justice. Loathing sham and without pretense, his abilities manifested themselves in a broad and earnest patriotism and devotion to his country, his family, and his friends. He was preeminent as a counsellor, and his judgment was often sought. Because of his capacity to look into the future, his ability to initiate, and his clear analysis of what had seemed intricate problems, the determination of great questions often rested him.

The history of our country records evidences of his unstinted labors and devotion to the highest and best interests of those whom he had been chosen to serve. This House honors itself in the tributes of love and respect we this day pay to the memory of Senator PLATT. A knowledge of his life's work of service should be an inspiration to all men. Well may his virtues and undaunted courage cause us to strive for the highest and best.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, others have already reviewed the details of the life and work of Senator O. H. PLATT. Let me refer to a bit of unwritten history with which he was connected and show the result of the influence which he exerted.

When the Republic of Hawaii was organized the first minister to this country chanced to be a personal friend of mine. Soon after his arrival at Washington he asked me to procure an interview for him with the senior Senator from Connecticut. On Senator PLATT'S suggestion the interview was held in a closed carriage on that same evening, and, as the driver wandered aimlessly for nearly three hours about the streets of Washington, inside of that carriage questions were put and answers given, policies discussed and conclusions reached, which ultimately brought Hawaii under the sovereignty of the United States as an organized Territory.

Leaving the minister at his home, I took the Senator to his hotel, and as he stepped from the carriage he said: "I guess the time has come when we must think about entering upon some form of a colonial system." From that day the one absorbing thought of his life was the relation which the United States, the dominant power of the Western Hemisphere, should hold to the weaker continental powers and the islands in the two oceans which wash our shores; and when a little later the war with Spain had thrown upon us the responsibility of Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines, and statesmen doubted as to the right of a representative republic to hold control and sovereignty of unrepresented peoples, he demonstrated beyond cavil or dispute, in a speech of wonderful simplicity but marvelous strength, that the United States possessed inheritently, as well as under its Constitution, all of the rights and powers pertaining to any absolutely independent sovereign nation. The Platt amendment to the Cuban constitution was only a practical application of the principles enunciated in the earlier speech, and it is entirely safe to say that, as Abraham Lincoln demonstrated to the world the right of the Republic to preserve its own life against attacks from within, so it is due to ORVILLE H. PLATT, as much as to any other one man, that the United States stands forth among the powers of the world to-day the equal of any in every right, in every privilege, in every degree and kind of sovereignty, and lacking in no respect in any prerogative enjoyed or claimed by any other. If he had done nothing else but this in his twenty-six years of service in the Senate, he would have left his imprint on the history of his time.

He entered the Senate in 1879, an ordinary New England country lawyer, but great enough to stick when flung up against the chance of greater opportunities. For a quarter of a century he studied and toiled for the welfare of a grateful constituency—no want of theirs too small to escape his notice; no demand too large or too frequent to exhaust his patience—and yet through it all it is manifest, as we look back over his life work, that he saw, as all must see who in the thick of things at the nation's capital see at all, that the real welfare and enduring prosperity of his own little State was inextricably bound up and absolutely interwoven with the larger national life. I do not believe that it ever entered into the mind of ORVILLE H. PLATT that his efficiency as a representative or his greatness as a Senator would or could be measured by the number or size of the appropriations which he might secure from the National Treasury for expenditure within the boundaries of his own State, for he looked upon the States as "members of one body," whose general welfare was his highest concern. Whether as chairman of the Committee on Territories or Patents, creating sovereign States in the then boundless West, or securing for the individual the reward of inventive genius, he worked just as patiently and devotedly in the one case as the other; but his thought, his counsel, and his vote were governed and controlled by the way in which he believed the interests of the whole people were to be affected by his action.

He loved to stand upon the very hilltop of national affairs and sweep into one view the whole horizon, and then retiring into solitude and seclusion work out to a wise solution the problems of our national life, over which other men with selfish thoughts and narrower vision oftentimes stumbled and fell.

He entered the Senate in 1879 literally a State man, unknown to the country at large and probably unacquainted with anyone there except possibly his own colleague from Connecticut. Twenty-six years later he died in his country's service a statesman in the true meaning of that word, a leader among leaders, and during all that time no man can truthfully say but that he bore a character above reproach, serving with fidelity and zeal his State, his country, and his God. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I first became acquainted with Senator ORVILLE H. PLATT when I entered the House, in December, 1883. He had then served four years in the Senate and was highly respected by his colleagues. He had already taken high rank as a lawyer and as a wise counselor.

I became more intimately acquainted with him during the passage of the McKinley tariff bill in 1890. I found him broad and liberal minded, with a thorough acquaintance with the condition of the industries of the country. I did not fail to consult him at that time upon many of the features of the bill. Associated as I was on the Committee on Ways and Means with Mr. McKinley (afterwards President), with Mr. BURROWS (now a Senator from Michigan), with Messrs. Dingley, Bayne, and Gear, all of whom are now deceased, and with Mr. McKenna, now a justice of the Supreme Court, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin, now a Senator, I still found it very advantageous to confer frequently with Senator PLATT of Connecticut.

During the preparation of the so-called "Dingley Act," in 1897, I learned still more to rely upon the judgment and sound sense of Senator PLATT. He was most intimately associated with the late Charles A. Russell, then a Representative from the State of Connecticut, and a distinguished member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Senator PLATT was gentle in his manner, modest, and retiring, a man never seeking opportunity to instruct or obtruding his advice, but who was much sought after by his colleagues on account of the soundness of his judgment. He was admitted to the bar when 22 years of age, and was indeed learned in the law. He was of the judicial temperament and not an aggressive partisan, although ever true to his convictions. He was not an orator in the ordinary sense of the term, but he had a way of stating his case clearly and of marshaling his facts in logical sequence so as to carry conviction to those who heard him. He never made a show speech nor an advertised one. He spoke only when he had an object to be attained and seemed to shrink from debate unless he felt it his duty to inform the Senate upon pending matters with which he was familiar. Therefore his speaking ever commanded the attention of the Senate. He was a persevering and laborious student and his mind was well stored with useful information and important facts. He went straight to the point. In the true sense of the word, on the basis that a successful speech is one that moves the minds of men and forces conviction, he was an orator of rare ability. He was honest, not alone in the sense that no dishonest dollar ever polluted his hand—honesty of that character entitles a man to comparatively little credit, though the lack of it even in that sense is abhorrent to all right-thinking men, and the acceptance of a bribe can not be too severely condemned as graft and theft—but Senator PLATT had a higher plane of integrity. He was honest in his work and in his studies, in his search for truth, and in the processes of his mind. He was careful to work out the truth and was not afraid to stand upon it.

He lived in the midst of industrial and commercial activity. During all the years of his political life his State was like a busy hive. He studied industrial questions with zeal and candor. The mutual and interdependent interests of capital and labor were a matter of daily observation. He brought to the study of these questions that strong common sense which was the most striking characteristic of his mind.

He served on the most important committees in the Senate, being for some years prior to his death chairman of the Committee on Relations with Cuba, a member of the Committee on Finance, on Indian Affairs, on Judiciary, on Private Land Claims, on the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, and on Patents. I am told that his committee work was the most important of all his services in the Senate. In the Senate or in the House the real work of the Legislature is done in committee. Here the great measures are generally most thoroughly considered; great questions are worked out to their last analysis, and on such matters the perfected bill in committee generally passes into law without much amendment. In the quiet of the committee room his indefatigable labor, his unerring judgment, and his concise and direct speech, as well as his talent for constructive statesmanship, won for him the first rank.

The crowning work of his Senatorial career is undoubtedly what is known as the "Platt amendments," introduced by him in the Senate in 1901 as amendments to the military appropriation bill. These amendments were afterwards embodied in the Cuban constitution and also in the permanent treaty with the Cuban Republic. At the time these amendments were introduced in the Senate there was much sentiment on the subject of our Cuban relations which had little foundation in reason. We undertook the war for Cuba, disclaiming and foreclosing in the declaration of war all thought or hope of national gain.

It was a war for humanity, undertaken in the spirit of friendship for the relief of the suffering people at our very gates. The story of our philanthropy toward the Cuban adorns the brightest page in our history. When the war was concluded, in carrying out our promise as the guardian of the Cuban people, and when we were about to give them a separate and independent government, there was danger that our philanthropic feeling, our desire not only to merit the good opinion of the world, but our fear of criticism in the slightest degree in the manner in which we should carry out our intention, would lead us into the adoption of measures not only unwise on our part, but which would prove disastrous to the Cuban Government and sow the seeds of its downfall. It was at this point that Senator PLATT came forward with his amendments. The propositions which he advanced were clearly in the interests of the Cuban people and of their infant Republic. They restricted the new Government from entering into any entangling alliance with foreign powers which might impair or tend to impair their independence or to permit any foreign power from obtaining a lodgment within its territory. They prevented them from entering into any public debt the payment of which should be beyond their means. This provision cut off the greatest menace to the stability of the Cuban Government.

The third amendment gave us the right to intervene for the preservation of Cuban independence and in the defense of the Cuban Government against internal as well as external foes.

The fourth amendment validated all acts of the United States in Cuba and all lawful rights acquired thereunder.

The fifth amendment exacted a solemn promise that Cuba should execute and, when necessary, extend our plans for sanitation throughout the island.

The sixth amendment left open the vexed question of title to the Isle of Pines, to be adjusted by future treaty.

The seventh amendment provided for coal and naval stations at certain points for the protection of Cuba and the defense of the United States against other nations.

These amendments were criticised somewhat at the time, and an endeavor was made to show that they would not be for the benefit of Cuba, but for the aggrandizement of the United States. Although they have been but five years in operation, the results have successfully vindicated the wisdom and patriotism of ORVILLE H. PLATT and furnishes an example of his foresight and statesmanship.

He lived out almost four-score years, which "by reason of strength" is allotted to few, and could look back upon a successful and well-spent life. He rests now from his labors on one of the beautiful hills of his native State. For more than a quarter of a century he had been a prominent figure in the other branch of the National Congress. There he had served his constituents with faithful toil, with patient zeal, with intelligence, and patriotism. He had made their cares, their toils, and their burdens his own. He had rejoiced with them in their victories. His memory is graven on their hearts, a living monument to the worth and true greatness of the man. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, up to the 4th of last March our Government had existed one hundred and seventeen years under the Constitution.

Connecticut, being one of the thirteen original States, had to that date two hundred and thirty-four years of service in the Senate of the United States at her disposal. By election or appointment she has sent thirty-six men to represent her in the less numerous branch of the Federal Congress, frequently but improperly denominated "the upper House:" Oliver Ellsworth, William S. Johnson, Roger Sherman, Stephen Mix Mitchell, James Hillhouse, Jonathan Trumbull, Uriah Tracy, Chauncey Goodrich, Samuel W. Dana, David Daggett, James Lanman, Elijah Boardman, Henry W. Edwards, Calvin Willey, Samuel A. Foote, Gideon Tomlinson, Nathan Smith, John M. Niles, Perry Smith, Thaddeus Betts, Jabez W. Huntington, Roger S. Baldwin, Truman Smith, Isaac Toucey, Francis Gillette, Lafayette S. Foster, James Dixon, Orris S. Ferry, William A. Buckingham, William W. Eaton, William H. Barnum, James E. English, ORVILLE HITCHCOCK PLATT, Joseph R. Hawley, MORGAN GARDNER BULKELEY, and FRANK BOSWORTH BRANDEGEE.

Our well-beloved friend, the late Amos J. Cummings, was wont to say that the average service of a Representative in Congress is four years. As a matter of fact, it is about six, and it is increasing steadily as constituencies fall more and more into the excellent habit of retaining faithful and capable Representatives.

The average Senatorial service is no doubt longer than the average Representative service, but the foregoing figures as to Connecticut show that had the Senatorial service of Messrs. BULKELEY and BRANDEGEE closed on the 4th of last March the average service of her Senators would have been only six and one-half years, which is astonishingly low when we remember that her conservatism is so pronounced that one of her popular sobriquets is "The Land of Steady Habits," and when we recall the further fact that she has experienced few political revolutions.

The brevity of the average service of her Senators seems the more remarkable when it is remembered that it is in the East in general and in New England in particular that length of service is held to be the proper reward of fitness and fidelity, though Missouri was the first State to send one man to the United States Senate for thirty consecutive years. She remains the only State to send two men to the United States Senate for thirty consecutive years each—Col. Thomas Hart Benton and Gen. Francis Marion Cockrell.

Of course the longer Senators BULKELEY and BRANDEGEE serve the more the average of Connecticut Senatorial service will be increased.

It is apropos to state in passing that their immediate predecessors, Messrs. PLATT and Hawley, served longer than any other Connecticut Senators, Senator PLATT'S service of more than twenty-six years being greatest of all.

Of Connecticut's thirty-six Senators, six resigned: Oliver Ellsworth, William S. Johnson, Jonathan Trumbull, James Hillhouse, Chauncey Goodrich, and Truman Smith.

They all resigned in the earlier days of the Republic, the last of them, Truman Smith, resigning in 1854. The resignation habit appears not to be growing in Connecticut.

As it is so unusual a thing for a Senator of the United States to resign, I have sought to discover the causes of their action, and here are the results of my investigations:

Ellsworth resigned in 1796 to accept the Chief Justiceship of the Supreme Court of the United States, which office he resigned in 1800 by reason of failing health. He was then appointed envoy extraordinary to France to negotiate a treaty.

Johnson, a man of scholarly tastes, wearying of the hurly-burly of politics, resigned to become president of Columbia College, New York. Very recently we have seen a president of that college, now a university, resign to become mayor of New York.

Trumbull resigned to become lieutenant-governor of Connecticut. He was subsequently elected governor eleven times. The resignation of Trumbull to accept the humbler position of lieutenant-governor seems inexplicable till we refresh our memories with the fact that in the beginning, before the Senate of the United States had practically absorbed all the functions of government, membership in that body was not so much valued or coveted as it is now. De Witt Clinton, one of New York's greatest statesmen, resigned a United States Senatorship to become mayor of New York City—that, too, at a time when everybody knew that he aspired to the Presidency.

Within the last half century several United States Senators have resigned to accept Cabinet positions and places on the Supreme Bench of the United States; but, so far as my memory now serves me, the only man in our day to willingly doff the toga of a Senator to accept an inferior position was that immortal Texan—Judge John H. Reagan—who resigned from the Senate to become head of the newly created Texas railroad commission.

Stranger even than the case of Trumbull is that of James Hillhouse, who resigned to become commissioner of the school fund, which position he held for many years.

No reason is assigned in any book that I could find why Goodrich resigned. He was subsequently lieutenant-governor, but not immediately.

No reason is given in the books why Truman Smith gave up his curule chair, but as he removed to New York City it may be fairly assumed that business matters furnish the clue to his action.

Nine of Connecticut's Senators died while members of the House of the Conscript Fathers: Roger Sherman, Uriah Tracy, Elijah Boardman, Nathan Smith, Thaddeus Betts, Jabez W. Huntington, William A. Buckingham, Orris S. Ferry, and ORVILLE HITCHCOCK PLATT.

Three of her Senators were Presidents pro tempore of the Senate: James Hillhouse, Uriah Tracy, and Lafayette S. Foster. Strange to relate, two of them held that position in one Congress—Uriah Tracy having been elected May 14, 1800, and James Hillhouse February 28, 1801.

Besides Oliver Ellsworth, whose service as Chief Justice renders his place in our annals secure for all time, two others, at least, of Connecticut's three dozen Senator's are great historic personages—Roger Sherman and Jonathan Trumbull.

Roger Sherman, in addition to holding a multitude of local and State offices, served in the Continental Congress, being one of the committee of five appointed to draft the Declaration of Independence, the others being Thomas Jefferson, John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, and Robert R. Livingston. That great quintette appear together in the large painting, The Signing of the Declaration, now hanging in the Rotunda of this Capitol.

Sherman was also a member of that great convention which framed our Constitution.

Having put his sign manual to the charter of our liberty, having aided in constructing the Constitution, he enjoyed the good fortune, the thoroughly merited honor, of serving in both Houses of Congress under that Constitution.

He was the progenitor of numerous distinguished soldiers, statesmen, and jurists. Two of his lineal descendants are Members of the present House—Hon. ROCKWOOD HOAR, of Massachusetts, and Hon. HENRY SHERMAN BOUTELL, of Illinois. Representative BOUTELL has a son named Roger Sherman Boutell. If that young man isn't a patriot, there is nothing in name or blood.

The name Jonathan Trumbull stands for two illustrious men—father and son. The father is the "Brother Jonathan" whom Washington loved and leaned upon and whose name stands for the personification of the typical American. The son was the United States Senator from Connecticut and Speaker of the House of Representatives.

One other Connecticut Senator fixed for himself an enduring place in the temple of fame by offering the famous "Foote resolution," which precipitated the Webster-Hayne debate, the most spectacular and momentous oratorical contest in the history of the Senate. Nobody can understand our history without reading that debate, and nobody can read it intelligently without recurring to the Foote resolution, which renders Foote's reputation as lasting as Webster's or Hayne's.

All in all, it may be safely stated that from the beginning to the present hour Connecticut's average of Senatorial ability has been as high as that of any of her sister States.

Men are prone to look back to a golden age and to locate all the great men in generations past. If a man's reputation survives his own era at all, time becomes a great magnifier of him. The plain, unvarnished truth is that this is the world's period of greatest development. In many respects this is the golden age. The public men of to-day are, on the average, equal to their predecessors in intellectual equipment. Divers men who are ranked as mere politicians now will be by the succeeding generations classed as statesmen.

To be a Senator of the United States even for one moment is a high honor—an honor which comes to few; but to be elected to the United States Senate for five full terms and to serve more than a quarter of a century is an honor so rare that it has come to less than a score of men in our entire history. This unusual honor was freely and gladly bestowed upon Senator PLATT by the good people of Connecticut.

He was a leader among his fellows—one of the ruling elders of the Senate.

Judged by the standard of things done rather than by the standard of things said, Senator PLATT may fairly be denominated a great Senator. He would have been a potent member of any Senate. He was neither a voluminous nor an eloquent speaker. He was a strong and luminous speaker. He possessed in an eminent degree the faculty of constructive statesmanship—which is the rarest sort. He was blessed with unusual powers of generalization. By reason of this faculty and of these powers he fastened his name to many important measures. He thus became a permanent historic figure. His memory will survive so long as men concern themselves with the great measures considered in the stirring times in which he was on the public stage, for he placed his indelible mark upon most of the legislation of the last quarter of a century.

[Mr. DE ARMOND addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, so it is that a brave, noble, unflinching man blazes a way through life which others may follow, confident that the ending will be beside waters that are still and fields that are green, starred with daisies and tinted with forget-me-nots and immortelles, where a haven of rest, not made with earthly hands, is waiting.

Our friend has gone from among us, but the impress of his character, his life, and his manly qualities abides with us. He was brave, fearless—not the bravery which at times seems to compel strong men to maintain a position once taken, to refuse to modify judgment, to alter proposed action, but that bravery which feared not to meet argument, to court investigation, that welcomed additional light, and when convinced of original error of judgment, or of action, to modify and change it.

Senator PLATT was truly a great man—great in thought, great in deed, great in mind. He left an impress here which will long endure. In appearance he might be described as grizzled, tall, angular, not quick of movement, nor overalert of thought, but honest and persistent of purpose, clear of discernment, accurate of judgment. His exterior contradicted his interior. Not in look did he evidence the kindliness and consideration of his nature. His voice had less of the austere than his presence. He was firm in his own convictions, yet considerate of the opinions of others. Ruggedly honest, he accorded honesty of thought and purpose to others. Idle prattle, passing rumor, moved him not.

He was strong in his friendships, a good lover, not so good a hater. His confidence shaken, was not easily regained, but he cherished not animosity. He never looked for trouble, yet he never sought evasion of his full share of responsibility. His full, fair measure of the everyday work of public life he did. He was not an orator, who stirred by eloquence of word or beauty of phrase, yet he made exceeding clear his meaning, and by the sincerity of his bearing carried conviction to other minds.

The longevity of his service to his country was exceeded only by its value. Almost a decade after passing the limit of man's allotted time, he served on. I never saw evidence of his knowledge of the weight of years, though I have heard him express it. His erect form had not bent, his clear mind did not give evidence of his years.

He had no failing period. Rugged and well he left us here, neither he nor his friends aware that the mighty work he had done had lessened his vitality, so that he was an easy prey to malady. Full of years and of honors, having lightened many a burden, warmed many a heart, with the harness on he dropped. He left no half-performed task. His work was always current. In his death his country lost a competent and true patriot, his State an illustrious representative, his friends a noble companion, mankind a fellow whose living made all living more worth while.

As life's evening shadow becomes little by little more apparent, as one's thought in the gloaming of a Sunday are more and more of the retrospect, as we feel the enthusiasm and the energy of life lessening, the more startling the fact that human life is exceeding brief. So brief, indeed, that the greatest wonder of human existence is that any single individual may even within its lengthened span, accomplish enough to impress his personality on his living time, and leave an influence to act after his taking away. That accomplished, a life has been well spent. Life's duties are many, are varied, are weighty. To meet them manfully, openly, without shrinking or evasion, to discharge them faithfully, bravely, and well, means a discharge of the human duties divinity has placed upon man.

Life's trials, too, are weighty. Endured with patience, borne with fortitude, submitted to with resignation, they add much to the lovable side of character, and make for an impress upon a community which is ever felt.

It is comforting and pleasant to look back upon the life of one of our dear, good friends who has been taken away, and mark how well he withstood life's buffets; how uncomplainingly he bore its burdens, how meekly he accepted its honors and delights. Now, we know the why of something, perhaps, which he concealed or covered up during his sojourn with us, and the solution of the problem adds to our admiration of his character and strengthens the lesson inculcated by his life. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, it is due to the memory of so distinguished a citizen that he who attempts his eulogy should be better prepared for facts and details than I am at the present moment.

I became acquainted with Senator PLATT at the time of the assembling of the Forty-ninth Congress, but my relation to him was not of that intimate character that brought me in close contact with him until several years after. He represented in the Senate in part my native State, and I felt toward him, as I do toward all the men of that State, a great deal of interest. He was a warm personal friend and counselor of the then Representative from the district in which I was born, the Hon. Charles A. Russell, one of the many distinguished Representatives from Connecticut who have appeared upon this floor since I came.

I was a Member of the House during the contest upon the McKinley bill, but not so intimately acquainted with the affairs of that great measure as I was later, when the Dingley bill became the controversy here. After the bill as passed in the House had gone to the Senate and been amended there very largely, it came to a committee of conference of which I was a member, and of which the Senator from Connecticut was also a member. And then I learned a great deal of the fine elements of his character in the long-drawn-out consultations in the Finance Committee room of the Senate over that measure. I learned this of his character: That he was a statesman who looked at the whole of the United States. He took in the interests of the people of the whole country, and while he carefully saw to it that no discrimination was made against the local interests of his own State, he would have scorned to have undertaken to do an injustice because it would put money into the pockets of his people. He was a bigger man than that. He had a better representative character. He covered more ground than the State of Connecticut or any of the interests of New England.

Upon the tariff question I considered him one of the best trained and best learned of the statesmen of his day. He did not champion the measures that he favored in the form of the advocate, but he looked at the question involved from the standpoint of the statesman. I observed his career at very near the close of his life, when he presided in the impeachment trial of Judge Swayne in the Senate of the United States. It was a position of high honor to him. The requisites for the place were great legal learning and high qualities of judicial mind. There were, of course, very able men who appeared in the prosecution—some of the very ablest of the Representatives of this House—and they were advocates in the true sense of the word. Various questions arose, some of considerable complication, and in no instance was the ruling of the Presiding Officer negatived by any considerable vote of the membership of the Senate. And when the trial closed, as I was leaving the Senate after the final vote had been announced, I congratulated the Senator upon the success that he had had in presiding in a controversy of such a bitter character as that was. He said—and I remember his exact words—"Well, it is something to have the approval of both sides, and I seem to have secured that." He was a man with a judicial mind. He was a fine lawyer and an able one.

It is an eventful career that brings a man to a notable standing and position in the Senate of the United States. Let carpers and critics say what they please, let men who live and breathe and grow fat and disagreeable in the realm of libel and slander and personal detraction harp upon and criticise the Senate of the United States, it will always be recognized until a mighty change takes place that the Senate of the United States is a great body of great men. It sometimes moves slowly, and we sometimes feel irritated at its course in that behalf, but at last when it makes a decision upon a great question of politics, a great industrial question, a great legal question, the opinion of the Senate of the United States in dignity and in moral effect upon the opinions of the world is second to no body of men in the world. Therefore, that Senator PLATT should have achieved high rank in the Senate is evidence conclusive that he was a man of superior ability and superior attainment. He was a gentleman who always appreciated the opinions of his opponents. I never heard him complain of the men he differed with. In the matters of legislation to which I have referred he stood with unyielding purpose in favor of certain local interests of his own State, but he fully appreciated that where the interests of his State collided with and ran against the interests of the great public the minor interests of the State must step aside, and it will not be forgotten by some of us who were then active in the tariff matters how gracefully and wisely he yielded to the mass of opinion as against the private interests of some of his own constituents. He was a broad-minded statesman, a man of unqualified integrity, a man of high attainment in the walk of life in which he served. Connecticut, a grand old State, historical all along the line of our history, has had no more fitting representative of her patriotism, her wisdom, her statesmanship than she had in the person of ORVILLE H. PLATT. He carved his name modestly, but ineffaceably upon the records of his country. His work was well done and it was finished. He might have been useful for many years, but he had earned reward and has entered into it. Honor to his name. His example to the men who knew him and to the men who are to come after him was valuable politically, legally, and patriotically.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] expected to be present and address the House, but was, unfortunately, called away. There are also several other Members who desired to speak on the character, life, and services of the late Senator PLATT, but who will not have the opportunity on account of the hour fixed for adjournment. I therefore ask unanimous consent that Members who desire be permitted to print remarks relating to this subject for the next thirty days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DENBY). Without objection, the request of the gentleman from Connecticut will be granted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is requested to announce that upon the adjournment of the House to-day the Members will form in a body in this Hall, march through the east door of the Capitol, and proceed to the place of the exercises.

The hour of 2 o'clock and 15 minutes having arrived, the House, in pursuance of its previous order, stands adjourned until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, April 15, 1906.

The House as called to order at 12 o'clock noon by the Clerk, Hon. ALEXANDER MCDOWELL, who read the following communication from the Speaker:

APRIL 15, 1906.

I hereby designate Hon. J. WARREN KEIFER to act as Speaker pro tempore for this day.

J. G. CANNON.

Thereupon Mr. KEIFER took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our heavenly Father, we thank Thee for all the revelations Thou hast made of Thyself which enable us to interpret life, especially for that light which broke in splendor upon the world nineteen hundred years ago in the resurrection of Thy Son, Jesus Christ, demonstrating the immortality of the soul and the unbroken continuity of life. Help us, we beseech Thee, so to live that each day shall be a preparation for the next, so that when we are called to the higher life we shall be prepared for whatever awaits us there.

We realize the fitness of this service here to-day in memory of one who served with distinction for many years upon the floor of this House A scholar, a statesman, a brave and gallant soldier, clear in his conceptions, pure in his motives, true to his convictions, he served his people, his State, and nation with honor and integrity, and leaves behind him a record worthy of emulation, and may the memory of his faithful service quicken us to nobler life and activity. In Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This day's proceedings have been set aside especially for memorial addresses in honor of the late BENJAMIN F. MARSH, a Representative in Congress and a Member-elect of the Fifty-ninth Congress.

Mr. MCKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions and move their adoption:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, the House now proceed to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. BENJAMIN F. MARSH, late a Member of this House from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That as a special mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House at the conclusion of the exercises to-day shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were considered, and unanimously agreed to.

Mr. MCKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that leave be granted for Members to print remarks relating to these exercises for ten days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. MCKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, it was my sad duty on the first day of this session to give formal notice of the death of the late BENJAMIN F. MARSH, for many years a distinguished member of this House from Illinois, and to state that at another time I would ask that a day be set apart for the proper consideration of his life, character, and valuable public services.

On March 7, by special order, this day was selected for these memorial exercises, and we have assembled this afternoon to pay a last tribute of respect to one who bravely and honorably met his responsibilities and who left behind him the record of a noble and patriotic life.

I shall not undertake, in the brief time I shall occupy, an extended review of his career, and, indeed, that would seem unnecessary, as in a larger measure than comes to most men the record of his deeds is written in the history of his country.

I shall, however, refer to the more important events of his busy life, and to those circumstances which molded and directed his course and finally fitted him for a rare and splendid citizenship.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN MARSH was born in Wythe Township, Hancock County, Ill., on November 19, 1835. His early years were passed upon a farm, where he acquired the rudiments of his education in the local schools. During a simple, frugal boyhood, amid wholesome surroundings, was laid the foundation of his strong and rugged character. In those formative years he acquired an interest in rural life and rural pursuits which never ceased, but rather strengthened with increasing years.

When the shadows had begun to lengthen, when burdens grew heavy and hard to bear, no days were so happy as those spent upon the farm where he was born; and the old homestead, so fruitful of cherished memories, remained his dearest possession until the final summons came.

When 14 years of age his father sent him to Jubilee College, located near Peoria, where for four years, under the wise direction of Bishop Chase, he diligently and faithfully pursued his studies. He labored earnestly to prepare himself for the obligations and responsibilities which even then he realized manhood would impose upon him.

His college course finished, he took up the study of law in the office of his brother, Judge J. W. Marsh, at Warsaw, being admitted to the bar in 1860, and afterwards associated with his brother in active practice.

During the same year, in flattering recognition of his talent, he was nominated as Republican candidate for States attorney for the counties of Hancock and Adams, but the district being largely Democratic, he failed of election.

And now while upon the very threshold of a cherished professional career, with the future seemingly assured, and success almost within his grasp, there came to him that summons which throughout his life proved irresistible and imperative—the call of duty. And when it came he did not deliberate, he did not hesitate nor count the cost. Danger threatened his country, brave men were needed, and personal interests were forgotten. At the first clash of arms he promptly tendered to the governor of Illinois a company of mounted men, but cavalry not being included in the first call for troops the offer was declined.

Being eager to go to the front, on May 24, 1861, he was mustered into service as second lieutenant of Company D, Sixteenth Illinois Infantry, and the same day was made quartermaster of the regiment.

On July 4, 1861, while serving with his regiment in Missouri, a telegram came from the governor stating his former tender of mounted troops would now be accepted. He returned at once to Warsaw, recruited the company, and on August 12, 1861, again entered the service as captain of Company G, Second Illinois Cavalry. With this splendid regiment he was identified until the close of the war, performing brave and valuable service in every Southern State, excepting Virginia and the two Carolinas.

On January 1, 1863, he was promoted to the rank of major. On May 4, 1864, he was made lieutenant-colonel, and soon after and until hostilities ceased, was in command of the regiment.

He saw much hard service and participated in many battles. The records of the War Department show that he was wounded in action at Holly Springs, Miss., on December 20, 1862, and during the course of his campaigns he received four gunshot wounds. And yet, despite his wounds and the suffering and disability occasioned thereby, he remained at the front in active service until he was honorably discharged at San Antonio, Tex., on November 22, 1865.

Strong, self-reliant, purposeful, he was ever a brave and efficient soldier, and his war record stands as a proud testimonial to his valiant patriotism. He was a fighting soldier and preferred the field of battle to the mock heroics of dress parade. His old comrades throughout the country still delight to relate the many heroic deeds he performed. There was no more welcome guest at reunion and camp fire than Colonel MARSH, and no one was listened to more attentively. His stories of camp and field and weary march were graphic portrayals of army life as seen through a soldier's eyes. Throughout the war, apparently unacquainted with fear, the only solicitude he expressed was for the comfort and welfare of those under his command. It is not surprising that such a leader should win the hearts of his comrades in arms, nor that he should gain and retain the respect and confidence of his fellow-citizens throughout his entire life.

At the close of the war he returned to Warsaw and resumed the practice of law. He was thus engaged until his election from the Tenth district in 1876 to the Forty-fifth Congress. From that time on his life was again devoted to the service of his country. He was well equipped for public station, and after his election he entered upon the new field of effort with the same fearlessness, the same patriotic devotion that characterized him during the time of war. Neither his courage nor his sincerity were ever doubted. In Congress he stood for what he believed was right, without regard to personal consequences. In fact, he had arisen above the thought of seeking personal success. He desired in the highest sense to be a public servant, and all his plans and purposes had in mind the welfare of the people. Careful, prudent, deliberative, in one direction alone he seemed to cast conservatism to the winds, and that was as the advocate, the champion of the interests of the old soldier.

After serving three terms in Congress he was defeated for reelection in 1882, on account of a lack of harmony among the party leaders of his district.

Philosophically accepting his defeat, he returned to his home, where he engaged in an avocation he dearly loved, being that of general farming and stock raising.

But this restful period was of short duration. On April 8, 1885, he was appointed by his lifelong friend, Governor Oglesby, railroad and warehouse commissioner of Illinois, and served the State with signal ability in that important position four years.

In 1888 he was a delegate to the Republican national convention.

The following year he was appointed by his lifelong friend Governor Oglesby railroad and warehouse commissioner of Illinois, and served the State with signal ability in that important position for four years. In 1892 he reentered Congress, from the Fifteenth Illinois district, being elected to the Fifty-fourth, Fifty-fifth, and Fifty-sixth Congresses. He failed of election to the Fifty-seventh Congress in 1900, his district being doubtful, with a normal Democratic majority which even he could not always overcome. Under the reapportionment which followed in 1901 he was placed in the Fourteenth district, and from the new district was again elected by large majorities in 1902 and 1904 to the Fifty-eighth and Fifty-ninth Congresses, the people thus clearly indicating that there had been no abatement of their confidence and respect. His physical health, however, was visibly failing, and the weight of years pressed heavily upon him. He suffered an attack of pneumonia during January, 1905, from which he never recovered. The end was near, and his death occurred on June 2, 1905, after a protracted illness following the sudden demise of his beloved wife on March 18 of the same year, and from which severe blow in his enfeebled condition he was unable to rally. He died as the soldier-statesman would prefer to die, with the harness on, with his face toward the front, and striving to the last to better the condition of his fellow-man.

I shall not attempt to consider his Congressional career. There are those present to-day who served with him in this House for many years and whose knowledge of his services here was derived from close personal association. A tribute of respect from these associates and colleagues will possess especial value, based as it will be, upon the insight and knowledge of intimate relationship. I leave to these friends the story of his Congressional services.

My own acquaintance with Colonel MARSH began thirty years ago, when he first entered Congress. It was my good fortune to meet him frequently thereafter during the remainder of his life. He always impressed me as being a man of purposes, of convictions. There was that about him which proclaimed the leader, not by assumption, but by right. Stalwart, rugged, strong, he seemed naturally to assume the attitude and bearing of a soldier, and yet he had a kindly face and from his eyes there shone a look of genial interest. Earnest and outspoken, he was always fair-minded and sincere. He asked no advantage of any man, nor would he accept one. He granted to all and demanded in return fair play. As he grew older he loved more and more to talk of his Army life, of the days when he rode with the boys in blue. He loved to meet the veterans of whatever branch of the service. Each soldier was to him a kinsman, and one of the dearest words he knew was "Comrade." At all times and everywhere he was known, and deserved to be known, as the soldier's true and loyal friend.

I doubt if any man in public life during this generation had the interests of the old soldiers more closely at heart. During his many years of public life he secured relief through pensions and otherwise for an immense number of veterans and their families. He never wearied of serving them, and always followed up their claims with faithful persistence.

And here I may say I have been impressed with the fact that although for years he suffered from wounds received in battle he seemingly forgot his own just right to recognition. The records of the Pension Office disclose no claim ever filed in his own behalf. And thus again was shown a striking characteristic of the man—thoughtfulness of others, indifference toward self. Like the sturdy oak, willing to give support and protection to all about him, he stood alone and would not ask for personal favors.

And thus he lived and wrought throughout his day. Stanchly he stood for the eternal right. Bravely he had taken up the burdens of life. Loyally and far he had borne them, and now, at the end of the way, with his course completed, contentedly and without regret he yielded to others duties and responsibilities no longer his. At the biblical limit of time his life's history was ended. His work was finished; dear ones had gone before. He yearned to hear the last call, and when it sounded, respected by all who knew him, loved and honored by associates and friends, he calmly paid the final tribute of mortality. He left behind him a record of unfaltering devotion to country, home, and friends that was untarnished, unsullied, and that should not perish from the earth.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, we are here this afternoon to pay a tribute to a man who was a very marked type of a class of men almost entirely passed away. He had lived the allotted period of seventy years, but the number of times he had seen the hour-glass turn is of little importance as compared with the purposes to which his life was devoted. His was a career filled with stirring and interesting events and continued activities, mental and physical, to its close. He belonged to the beginnings of the settlement in the State of Illinois, one of those States which were settled without the medium of the railroad, when the only means of transportation were the highways that the rivers furnished and the scattered trails traversed by the adventurous settler in the prairie schooner. Born amidst this pioneer life in 1835, he witnessed the incoming of the immigrants from the South and from the Southwest, and from the East, from the New England States, each group contributing its peculiar political and religious ideas, and forming factors of the great discussed upon slavery, of which Illinois was so interesting and important a center.

He saw the settlers leave the richer prairie lands to the undisputed possession of the wild flowers and build their first homes in the less fertile woodlands along some stream for better protection from the winds and weather, and from material for their rude cabins and furniture.

The citizens of that early day were necessarily isolated. It gave to them opportunity for reflection that a denser population would not have afforded. It developed philosophers and independent thinkers. Every man is largely created by his environment. The philosophy and rugged honesty of pioneer life were woven into the character of Lincoln and helped to create him even as it entered into the brave soldier and statesman whom to-day we remember, Col. BENJAMIN F. MARSH.

The open-air life and the very hardships of that time contributed to that splendid physique and erect, fearless, forceful bearing and commanding figure which were his.

He continued to be fond of outdoor life. He was fond of outdoor sports and physical exercise to the very last. He had some pride in his hardy young manhood and told me of an incident which occurred at a little Episcopalian college at Jubilee, Peoria County, Ill., when he attended there as a student. In midwinter his college mates dared him to plunge into a little lake and swim across. Nothing daunted, he plunged in and accomplished the feat, suffering no perceptible consequences of his rash act. On account of the lack of roads in the early day horseback riding was universal. He delighted in it. Little did he think that one day this accomplishment would serve him well as the dashing, brave commander of a Federal cavalry regiment, sweeping over the entire area of the theater of war save three of the Southern States.

In his home county at Nauvoo, Ill., as a young man he witnessed the strangest political and sectarian development which perhaps ever occurred in this country. It was so decidedly at war with our institutions and our inherited religious faiths. It was within a few miles of his home that occurred the rise and fall of the Joseph Smith settlement. He witnessed the equally strange Mormon exodus resulting in the establishment of another religious oligarchy far to the westward, which lived and reigned powerful, yet always in defiance to our laws and traditions, for a half century, not until now giving any real signs of submission. During the lifetime of BENJAMIN F. MARSH over half the States of the Union were admitted. He passed through a wondrous period of political and material development. He lived in the day when honesty was not enforced through fear of the law, but by virtue of the strength of public opinion. He lived in the time when personal courage was a necessity and when it was estimated as one of the highest virtues. He saw principles of government worked out and solved by the strong right arm and wrought only through human blood. He lived in a time when there was necessity for strenuous physical exertion for battling with the elements, and that strong, rough life developed rugged virtues peculiar to that day and age, and his viewpoint of public questions was necessarily influenced by the manner of his development. There was developed in the pioneer a type of character peculiar to his own locality. It gave him a touch of individualism which can not be found in the later day, when men's environment are largely alike and when we come in contact with the influence and ideas of all parts of the United States. Thus bred, he retained a picturesqueness that suggested the old days in his larger career. I was privileged to enjoy the favor of his intimate friendship. I know that he would be proud to give large credit to the manhood and womanhood of early Illinois for whatever he accomplished in the greater days of his life.

To him the civil war, in which he engaged from 1861 to 1865, was a serious and a holy contest for human liberty and for the preservation of the nation. He never alluded to its experiences flippantly. Its issues remained to him solemn ones to his death.

His career as a soldier remained, while other honors came to him, still the most precious. Leaving his law books, fresh from his admission to the bar, he recruited a cavalry company, which was not accepted. He was not to be deterred, however, from entering immediately into the conflict, and he enlisted as a private soldier, serving a short time until he was summoned back to the State and commissioned as captain of Company G, Second Regiment of Illinois Cavalry. Afterwards he was promoted to major, and finally as lieutenant-colonel of the same regiment, which he commanded until his honorable discharge from the service at San Antonio, Tex., November 24, 1865.

The Government records, which I have taken pains to examine, contain many references to Captain, Major, and Colonel Marsh, and all furnish a story of faithfulness, bravery, and efficiency. He believed most thoroughly in the volunteer soldier as the means for furnishing the body of the future great army in times of war for the protection of the nation. He therefore took a great interest as chairman of the Committee on Militia of the House of Representatives in laws for increasing the efficiency of the militia in the States.

His Army experience made him a valuable and able member of the Committee on Military Affairs during the period in the war with Spain. His later service in the House was on the great Committee on Appropriations, placed there by the Speaker of the House, his long-time and intimate friend and colleague.

Sixteen years of total legislative service he gave to his country as faithfully and efficiently as he did formerly in the ranks of war.

The strongest passion of his heart, I verily believe, was his love of country. He gloried in its power and influence, in its extending strength and participation in international affairs. No doubt fretted his soul in view of the unfolding new problems which confronted the nation. He looked upon the flag as the old Roman looked upon his eagles. He was proud of the victories of our arms on land and the triumph of our Navy upon the seas. With the sinking of the Maine this old warrior clamored restlessly for war, and at its close he faced just as confidently its consequent problems. He considered that the resulting acquisition of the Philippines would give added opportunities of the larger Republic in the field of commerce as well as in the dissemination of our political principles throughout the world. He believed in expansion. He believed in the constant trend of the past twenty-five years toward a larger national grasp of the affairs of the people by the Federal branch of the Government. He was a nationalist. He believed there were no dangers in the tendency of the present times, but was assured that that tendency promised our ability to fulfill our high duty and destiny as one of the great nations of the earth.

He loved his party and was loyal to its principles in the same way that he loved and had confidence in the possibilities and powers of his nation. He believed that his party flag was very near to the national one. He believed that the success of the party to which he belonged was a prime necessity for this nation working out its legitimate future. There never came to him any fine distinctions and questionings whether he should on some particular occasion follow his party flag.

He was always in the ranks, a faithful soldier, obeying the political command of his leaders as he followed his military commander on the field of battle. Most of us living to-day learn the history of this Republic from the cold and passionless page. He learned the history of almost three-quarters of a century of time and events in the panorama of the performance of the acts of living, breathing men which lead to a constitutional evolution of the fundamental principles of our Government long before it was ratified in the regular way by the votes of the States. Therefore he viewed the problems which came to him during his service in Congress from a different standpoint than do the men who view them from the standpoint of theory. His soul never quailed, therefore, in view of the larger field of action of the Republic. He had seen graver problems triumphantly solved. He believed that we were destined to the same unbroken successes which had been our experience from the time that the constitutional foundation of our Government was first laid, with Washington as our first President.

As I stood at the grave a few months ago, when his children cast in flowers upon his lowered body, amidst the silent homage of his comrades and neighbors, there must have come to those children and the assembled friends the thought which came to me and comforted me. It was that this was a life well rounded and complete, which had fully justified its own existence from a human standpoint. How full a fruition did he see, before he died, of all his hopes for which he had fought, and worked, and striven. So I say, peace to the ashes of this old Roman. All honor to the old fighter on the field of battle as well as in the forum of political discussion. There comes to us profit from a study of his life, from a reflection upon his devoted patriotism, his faithfulness to public duty, and his high estimate of physical bravery as a virtue as well as moral courage.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, it was stated to me only last evening that I would be expected, if I saw fit to do so, to make a few comments upon the character and career of our dead Congressman from the standpoint of my knowledge of him. I shall not attempt to describe his career outside of Congress.

The able presentation of the facts connected therewith by his distinguished successor leaves it unnecessary for me, even if I thought it wise, to do so. We only see one side of a Congressman's character here. Those of his colleagues from Illinois can very much better speak of his career in civil life than we can, and they have a much wider and more detailed view of his career in civil life than we can have. Now, I imagine that if some people had met Colonel MARSH sometimes on the floor of this House and listened to him for half an hour, they would not have gone away impressed with the genial, kind, and benevolent characteristics which his colleagues know he possessed. The gentleman who has preceded me spoke of the old fighter. Well, he was a fighter in this sense: He had a great deal of confidence in several things, and when he had his mind thoroughly made up, I think he never yielded his opinion, and he fought for it in the sense he stood for it, believed in it, and never compromised.

Now, I think one of his strongest characteristics, Mr. Speaker, was this: He believed in doing the right thing as a Member of Congress regardless of anybody's opinion outside of Congress. He had an element that makes a man strong in the country. He had an element in his character the lack of which will destroy any man in Congress. The man who comes to Congress to vote as somebody out in his district wants him to vote might just as well go home the day after he gets here and save his extraordinary expense of living in Washington and get out as soon as the two years roll around, because the man who does that will be dodging, dodging, dodging all the time, and the men who come to something here never dodge. MARSH did come to something here, and MARSH never dodged. He said one day, when some one here on the floor suggested to him that some element in his district would oppose something that he was in favor of, that he was a school-teacher as well as a Congressman, and he would try to teach those people that he was right, but he would not do it by dodging, by shrinking from the discharge of his duties. He was a man who studied carefully the questions involved here. Sometimes long debate would ensue, in which he took no part, but always, if you spoke to him about it, if you discussed the subject with him, you found he understood it. He was a man who kept in touch with discussions and kept in touch with questions and always acted intelligently. His career as a soldier was a career that he might well be proud of, yet I never heard him boast of it. I never knew him to assert or assume any position upon any question that came up here that he did not assign as well to others. He was modest in asserting his own knowledge of military affairs, and he was modest in asserting the claims that he put forward to his comrades. He had the characteristic of a man who believed he was right, and stuck to it. He was a Republican. He believed strongly in the Republican party and he believed in party organization. He believed what I believe, that we live in a country governed by political parties, and if he ever scorned anything with the bitterness of which he was capable, one thing above another, it was the scorn of a man or organization which undertook to reform the world and the country outside of the reformation that could be worked out through some sort of party organization. I heard him say one day that some reform movement that started somewhere put him in mind of the sudden exhibition of growth in a tender plant. I do not remember the plant that he indicated as his illustration, but he said the first frost would kill it. He believed just as honestly as he believed in his existence that if any other party than the Republican party got into power in the country it would be injurious to it, and, therefore, he felt it his duty to stand by the organization of his party; but no man ever heard him hesitate to speak boldly and strongly in favor of what he believed to be the duty of his party, and, having done all he could to bring his party into line, he then decided that its action was better action than he could probably find in the other party, and so he was a Republican, a Republican partisan, and he was one man who came to something in the Republican party.

No halfway man was he, no compromiser, and yet I believe he had as just an appreciation of any man's opinion as anybody else had, but having made up his mind the other man was wrong, he never compromised with him. He belonged to a type of men who came to us from those Western States, who grow up there among the pioneers of the great States of which he was so proud, a State that has honored itself by sending to Congress the great men that have come—the Trumbulls, the Douglasses, and the men of that early period, and then the present worthy representatives in the Senate and in the Government. He grew up in the West. I do not know that it is especially important that he grew in the West, except that we know very well men take character from surroundings, from environment, and that environment goes down into the very ramifications of life in all its forms and surroundings. The great prairies of the West, the mighty rivers, the great enterprises, the population, have always had their effect upon the growing generation of men, and Colonel MARSH came here in the fullness of his great power as a representative man of the elements of which he had grown up in the midst.

I knew nothing of his army career, and shall have nothing to say about it. It is a great thing for him and for his descendants, if he has them, that he should have such a record as this. The country will never fail to remember a man who suffered and stood firm and carried out his principles afterwards as Colonel MARSH did. No sickly sentimentalism drove him anywhere. He went in obedience to the stern voice of duty. The House lost a strong Member, the State of Illinois a worthy son, and the Congress of the United States was weaker the day that MARSH died.

So we come to honor him. We meet to express our loyal appreciation of his high character. We meet to pledge ourselves to renewed activity along the lines of patriotic action which he traveled. We come to leave the impress of our opinion and our judgment upon the written page, so that the young men who follow us may read and understand how much we value the stern and stolid characteristics of Colonel MARSH. His career was worthy of emulation, his record the record of a true American. The memory of him will be talismanic in the history of the American Congress. May his colleagues, who have lost a worthy Member of a great delegation, copy his virtues and revere his memory.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, BENJAMIN F. MARSH, of Warsaw, Hancock County, State of Illinois, was not only my comrade in war, but my personal friend. We entered this House of Congress (the Forty-fifth) together almost thirty years ago. This is my brief and humble tribute to his memory.

Besides being the possessor of a good scholastic education, he had studied and practiced law and was otherwise well equipped for the performance of the important duties of a national Representative, and this his long and faithful services here abundantly proved. He also belonged to the farmer class and knew their interests well.

He served in the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh (1877–1883), Fifty-third, Fifty-fourth, Fifty-fifth, Fifty-sixth (1893–1901), and Fifty-eighth (1903–1905) Congresses, and was elected to this Congress in 1904, but died June 2, 1905, before he could take his seat. His total actual service in this House was sixteen years, covering a memorable period in the history of his country, and during this period he actively participated in legislation, especially such as related to the Army.

Though always a Republican, he was not a partisan in any offensive sense, his purpose always being to promote his country's best interests. His service here covered the period of the war with Spain (1898), and he heartily supported the policy of driving Spain from the Antilles and from the continent of America because of her cruelty to her Cuban subjects, a singularly new policy in the history of the world. No war was ever before declared or brought about between so-called "civilized" nations purely on humanitarian grounds; that is, by one nation insisting on another surrendering its sovereignty over a part of its own country and the inhabitants thereof, its citizens and subjects, purely because of the nation's injustice, oppression, and cruelty to them. Indeed, it is the only instance where one nation declared a portion of another free. So the joint resolutions of Congress of April 8, 1898, declaring "that the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent," and demanding of Spain that it "at once relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba and withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters" was the first and only such declaration directed against another nation ever made in the history of the world. The year 1898 marks a new era in civilization, and the Spanish war stands as the first and only one brought on by the action of one independent nation toward another between which no international dispute or substantial cause for difference had arisen. BENJAMIN F. MARSH by voice and vote upheld this new national departure.

His long and distinguished services in the civil war—1861–1865—also materially aided in training him for courageous and efficient services in Congress. He enlisted as a private soldier in the first days of the war, and at once saw active service. A few weeks later he recruited a company of cavalry and was commissioned its captain, and through conspicuous field service and for skill and bravery in battle he was promoted until he reached the colonelcy of his regiment (Second Illinois Cavalry), which rank he held until after the close of the war (January, 1866). He campaigned and fought in all the States where the war raged save in Virginia and the Carolinas. He was distinguished throughout his army life for bravery, military skill, and good judgment. He fought in some of the great battles of the war and in many minor engagements and affairs, and he received four gunshot wounds more or less severe. He shed his blood for cause and country. Though his rank was not high or his command large, his achievements were always great, and his honor unsullied. He, though less than 30 years of age when the war was over, proved himself equal to and worthy and capable of high command. If his name and fame were not heralded as far as that of other officers holding more important commands, justice awarded to him equal honors with them. He earned his promotions on the battlefield. Without the matchless valor of such men as Colonel Marsh immortal military fame would not have come to the great commanders in that war.

His whole life was peculiarly unselfish. He was not without ambition in war or peace, but his ambition was to do his duty in all relations of life. He had no vain professions or pretenses. He was absolutely honest, and was always plain spoken. He did not pretend to oratory here or elsewhere; he ripened his judgment by investigation and thought. He was not arbitrary in his opinions, but he was not moved to surrender a judgment once deliberately formed save for the most convincing reasons. He had in his private and public career the courage of his convictions. His plain and direct speech made his whole life an open book.

He resided, child, boy, and man, in the county (Hancock, Ill.) of his birth seventy years. He was born on the frontier of civilization and among a sturdy, hardy people who took life seriously and who knew what liberty in our Republic cost and meant. They believed in peace, but did not neglect to assert the individual sovereign rights of man; and they believed in the equality of man. A test of that equality is that each man should fearlessly assert and defend all his own individual rights and concede the same rights to each of his fellow-men.

Mr. MARSH'S constituents knew him, and proved their confidence and faith in him by electing him to this House several times when his party (Republican) was not in the majority. His life and character might well be emulated, and should be pointed to as furnishing the best example of the duties of citizenship well performed and of a life well spent. In the years of his life he saw slavery abolished in his country and, as a consequence, largely throughout the world; he saw the Union of the States recemented more firmly than ever before; he witnessed his country grow in population from about 13,000,000 to 85,000,000; he saw more of moral and material progress take place than ever had taken place in a like period in the ages gone by; he saw civil and religious liberty move up higher and higher, and he died full of years spent in good deeds for man and country, and conscious that he had patriotically done his whole duty. The world is better because BENJAMIN F. MARSH lived.

His life may be summed up as that of a typical soldier in the time of his country's need, of a faithful and capable statesman and legislator in the nation's council, and, above all, that of an exemplary citizen of a free Republic.

> Let the sound of those he wrought for
> And the feet of those he fought for > Echo 'round his bones for evermore.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, on this beautiful and hallowed Easter Day, which means so much to the world, we have gathered to pay our respects to the life, character, and public services of B. F. MARSH, late a Member of this House from the Commonwealth of Illinois. It seems to me that no words can be said better than what he said of himself. With his own hand he penned the following with reference to his own life:

BENJAMIN F. MARSH, Republican, of Warsaw, Hancock County, was born in Wythe Township, in said county, and reared on his father's farm; was educated in private schools until 14 years old, when he was sent to Jubilee College and entered upon a classical course, pursuing the same for four years, lacking one year of graduation; entered the law office of his brother, Judge J. W. Marsh, at Warsaw, and was admitted to the bar in 1860; same year was a candidate on the Republican ticket for the office of State's attorney in the district then composed of Hancock and Adams counties; the district being Democratic, he was defeated by the late Calvin A. Warren, one of the best lawyers in western Illinois; under Mr. Lincoln's first call for volunteers, in 1861, he enrolled a company of cavalry and went to Springfield and tendered the same for and during the war of the rebellion to Governor Yates, but as cavalry was not included in the call, the company was not then accepted; on his way home he enlisted as a private in the Sixteenth Illinois Infantry Volunteers, then at Quincy, and served in said regiment in northern Missouri until, on the 4th day of July, 1861, while at Monroe Station, he received a telegram from Governor Yates accepting his cavalry company; immediately going home, he in a few days recruited a company of cavalry, was commissioned captain, and assigned to the Second Regiment Illinois Cavalry; he was finally commissioned colonel of this regiment and served continuously until January, 1866, having campaigned in every seceding State except Virginia and the two Carolinas; he received four gunshot wounds and carries in his body rebel lead; returning to Warsaw, he resumed the practice of law until 1877; in 1869 he was the Republican candidate for the constitutional convention; in 1876 he was elected to the Forty-fifth Congress from the then Tenth district and was reelected to the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses; in 1882 he was again a candidate for Congress, but was defeated; returning home in 1883, at the expiration of his term in Congress, he engaged in general farming and stock raising, and is still so engaged; in the spring of 1889 he was appointed by Governor Oglesby railroad and warehouse commissioner, and held the same for four years; he was a delegate to the Republican national convention in 1888; was elected to the Fifty-third, Fifty-fourth, Fifty-fifth, and Fifty-sixth Congresses from the Fifteenth district, and elected to the Fifty-eighth Congress from the new Fourteenth district, receiving 19,404 votes, to 13,195 for J. W. Lush, Democrat; 1,118 for R. F. Kindler, Socialist, and 988 for P. M. Carrishon, Prohibitionist.

A remarkable record of a remarkable man. As a former Speaker of this House, and now one of its honored Members, has said to us this day that he entered this House with the late Mr. MARSH in the Forty-fifth Congress, and served with him and watched his course, and paid a high tribute of respect to him, so can we of a more recent period of service say likewise of him that he was a distinguished Member of this House in the Fifty-third, Fifty-fourth, Fifty-fifth, Fifty-sixth, Fifty-eighth, and Fifty-ninth Congresses.

I have just looked at the list of members in the Senate and in the House from the great Commonwealth of Illinois in the present Congress. I find that there is but one member of that body, consisting of two Senators and twenty-five Members, that, like the late Mr. MARSH, served his country from 1861 to 1865. This in itself is indicative of the changes that have come over this body and over this country since Colonel MARSH first became a Member of this House, and the changes that have come over the country since he became a Member of the House after the great civil war from 1861 to 1865. Think of it, my countrymen. The State of Illinois, that gave to the country the two central figures of the last century, that gave to the country and to the world the typical volunteer soldier of the age in which he lived—the great John A. Logan—is to-day represented in this great body by but one of the distinguished men who served with that distinguished group of men from 1861 to 1865. It shows that this, like other bodies, is a passing one. It shows that the splendid men who stood for something and performed those heroic deeds from 1861 to 1865 are gradually being gathered to the fathers and have gone to the other side. Other and younger men have taken their places. The great trust that they so well discharged, and that they handed to us, has been given for us to carry out and to see that that for which they wrought, that that for which they labored, shall be maintained and perpetuated and handed to others in the same manner that we received it from them.

Colonel MARSH was a man that was loved by his fellow-men. It is my privilege now to represent two of the counties that he long represented in Congress. I have met face to face and have talked heart to heart with many of the old comrades in Schuyler and in Adams counties who served with Colonel MARSH from 1861 to 1865, who knew him intimately and closely, and I say to my colleagues here and to the country that each and all of them loved and respected their comrade. He was their friend and he loved them and they loved him—a strong, forcible character.

It was my privilege to be at his home on the banks of the Mississippi when, in the month of June, we laid him away in his little home cemetery.

I saw the concourse of his neighbors and friends as they came there to pay their last tribute of respect to their neighbor and their friend. As the last sad rites of the church had been said over him there stepped forth at the open grave a man and a comrade of his. He said: "By direction of the deceased and at his request, I want to sound 'taps' over my comrade." This promise was made by Mr. Lemon Wiley, an officer of this House, to the deceased as the two comrades talked together in the New Willard Hotel, and he made a trip of nearly 100 miles to carry out that promise that he had made to his deceased comrade and friend. As those "taps" sounded there that afternoon, so familiar to the soldier, there was not a dry eye at that burial spot. That was the token of respect and tribute of a common soldier to an officer of the grand volunteer forces of this country. To me it was one of the highest tributes that it was possible for one man to have paid to another.

The more, Mr. Speaker, I travel about and meet my countrymen, the more thoroughly I am impressed with the greatness of our country and its people. Coming from the lowly walks of life, born in a country village along the banks of the Mississippi, mingling as an ordinary country boy among his associates, there came up a man by years of growth to occupy a high and distinguished position in the Army of his country; there came up a man to occupy a high and distinguished position on the floor of the greatest parliamentary body on the face of the earth; and yet, during all that growth from lowly, humble life to the high station that he occupied the hand and heart was ever grasping out and reaching toward his fellow-men who were moving along in the ordinary affairs of life. What other country can present such a spectacle? What other country is there that has within its limits men of that kind and character, ever sympathizing with the efforts of their fellow-men, as does this Republic of ours?

I saw here just a few moments ago a former distinguished Member of this House, Gen. T. J. Henderson, who served with Colonel MARSH on the floor of this House, and who, like him, has come up from the body of the people; and so, Mr. Speaker, can I say the same of you, Gen. J. WARREN KEIFER. Of you, and men like you, our country should feel proud. You have made it what it is. But for what men like Colonel MARSH, General Henderson, and you and your comrades did from 1861 to 1865 we would have no country to-day worthy of consideration among the nations of the earth. It is therefore well and proper on occasions of this kind to pay the respect that is due the men who preserved this Union, and whose lives and efforts from 1861 to 1865 gave to us, my colleagues—younger by far than those men—the opportunity we have to sit here with our colleagues from the South as a reunited, happy, prosperous people, living under one flag, under one Government, managed, upheld, and controlled by officers of one Government, passing the laws that we do, and being in full accord under the Constitution and laws of our country.

I can say no more, and ought not. I wish to pay my personal testimonial of respect to the memory of the deceased, who was a strong, forceful character, loyally devoted to his country in peace and in war, and who worked and wrought to the uplifting of mankind; and there, on the banks of the Mississippi, near by the waters of that great river, sleeps that great warrior and awaits the call of the Father, when he, like many others, will join his comrades gone before, and at that great reveille join the great commander, Lincoln, and around him those other comrades who wrought the great work in this great country of ours—Grant and Sherman, and Sheridan and Meade and the lesser lights—and there in that great assembly of splendid men will be found the strong, stalwart figure of BENJAMIN F. MARSH.

Mr. RODENBERG. Mr. Speaker, the State of Illinois has added many illustrious names to our country's heritage of great and noble men. In the storm and stress of war and in the calm of peace, in the sunshine of prosperity and in the shadows of adversity, in all of the vicissitudes of our national life Illinois has never failed to discharge the full measure of her duty and devotion to the Republic.

To-day we have met to pay a tribute of love and respect to the memory of one of her most distinguished sons, a brave, manly, and courageous man who, in his day and generation, did his full part toward giving Illinois her proud place in the sisterhood of States.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN MARSH was a native of Illinois and belonged to that splendid school of statesmen and soldiers which included Lincoln, Grant, Logan, Oglesby, and Palmer, a school which made patriotism its watchword and duty its guiding star. Theirs was the genius that had its origin in the loftiest ideals of American citizenship and drew its holiest inspiration from the immortal principles of liberty and equality upon which the magnificent structure of this mighty Government has been reared. They believed implicitly in their country, in its hopes, its aspirations, its purposes, and its destiny. As the clouds gathered and the gloom thickened their faith only grew the stronger. Civilization owes them a debt of gratitude which time can not efface and posterity can never hope to repay. They have bequeathed to us the priceless legacy of liberty under the law, and, catching the spirit that breathes upon us from their hallowed memories, we should pledge ourselves anew to maintain this sacred heritage in all its purity, in all its strength, and in all its glory.

To me Colonel MARSH was the highest and purest type of the ideal citizen soldier. There was something in his strong and rugged personality that seemed to form a link between the present and the heroic past. The martial spirit was ever with him. He was part Roman, part Spartan, and all American. One could easily imagine him riding at the head of his regiment with drawn sword that caught its brightness from the "princely gleaming of his soul" into the thickest of the fray and into the very jaws of death. He was the living impersonation of the highest moral and physical courage, the embodiment of personal honor and personal bravery. Conscious of the righteousness of his cause, influenced only by patriotic considerations of duty, we who know him well can readily believe that he would have willingly sacrificed his life in defense of the principles for which he contended.

During the Fifty-sixth and Fifty-eighth Congresses it was my good fortune to become intimately acquainted with Colonel MARSH, and the closer our acquaintance the greater my admiration for his many excellent qualities of head and heart. When in a reminiscent and reflective mood no man was more interesting or entertaining. At such times he displayed a marvelous and comprehensive knowledge of political history, and his keen analysis of men and measures was as instructive as his philosophy was profound. Always an intense partisan, with an abiding faith in the truth and justice of his party's principles, he adopted as his rule of political conduct the dictum, "He serves his country best who serves his party best." And yet, notwithstanding in this intense loyalty to his party's decrees, he never failed to show the most tolerant and respectful consideration for those who differed with him. Beneath the gruff exterior there was a knightly heart of purest gold full of tender sympathy and Christian charity. He believed in the cardinal virtues, and manifested this belief in his daily intercourse with his fellow-men.

For sixteen years he represented a constituency in this Chamber, and this long service is in itself an eloquent tribute to his personal worth and an evidence of his hold on the confidence and affection of the people who knew him best. Endowed by nature with an intellect keen, discriminating, and alert, always conscientious and painstaking in the discharge of his public duties, no Member rendered more faithful and efficient service to his constituency than our departed friend. We who served with him will miss his wise counsel and valuable advice. We mourn his death because we loved him, and our sorrow is intensified by a realization of the melancholy fact that he was the last of that splendid galaxy of intrepid heroes, born of the heat and strife and blood of the great civil conflict, to serve the people of the State of Illinois in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, one by one the men who helped to preserve the perpetuity of our country and its sacred institutions are joining that innumerable caravan that is marching in unbroken phalanx past the Great Captain for final review. In the beautiful cemetery of the picturesque little city of Warsaw, nestling gently among the mute, majestic hills, at whose feet forever roll the murmuring waters of the mighty Mississippi, amid the happy scenes of his youth, beside the faithful companion of his long and eventful life, our friend is sleeping the sleep of eternity. Slowly and sadly we consign his mortal remains to the cheerless grave, and as the sods moistened by our tears close in above them we call and listen. From the voiceless tomb there comes no answer. Only an echo which seems to mock our sorrow is wafted back. The somber shadows thicken. All is dark. We are overwhelmed in doubt. But suddenly the mystic veil which separates the present from the hereafter is swept aside. A light breaks forth. It is the light of the spirit of immortality, triumphant still, shedding joy and peace and hope eternal. In yon windowed palace of heaven we see this grand old patriot of ours crowned with a wreath of immortal glory, and among the myriad thousands who take part in the coronation we behold again the countless legions that offered up their lives on the altar of their country that "government of the people, by the people, and for the people might not perish from the earth."

Mr. Speaker, on this sacred Easter Sabbath day, while all the world is commemorating the resurrection of the crucified Christ, our thoughts wander back to the newly decorated grave in the little cemetery at Warsaw that contains all that is mortal of BENJAMIN FRANKLIN MARSH. To-day we remember again in "what a forge and what a heat" was shaped the nobility of that gallant, intrepid soul, and as we read anew the inspiring story of his self-sacrificing devotion to the highest ideals of his country, with one accord we unite in the sentiment so beautifully expressed by the poet:

Rest on, embalmed and sainted dead,
Dear as the blood ye gave;
No impious footstep here shall tread
The herbage of your grave.
Nor shall your glory be forgot
While Fame her record keeps,
And honor points the hallowed spot
Where Valor proudly sleeps.
Nor wreck, nor change, nor winter's blight,
Nor Time's remorseless doom,
Shall dim one ray of glory's light
That gilds your deathless tomb.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, without feeling that I can add anything of importance to what has been said to-day, or what will be said by others upon this sorrowful occasion, yet I can not let the opportunity pass without paying my tribute of respect briefly to our friend the late Hon. BENJAMIN F. MARSH, who was in his lifetime one of Illinois's grand old men, who are so fast passing away from the scenes of life, or from active participation in the affairs of the world.

He belonged to an age of great men, of men who became famous, who made Illinois great in song and in story; Illinois, the home of Abraham Lincoln, the great war President, and of Ulysses S. Grant, of John A. Logan, of Richard J. Oglesby, of Thomas J. Henderson, of Stephen A. Hurlbut, who all became famous during that period of the civil war as patriots in war, and afterwards as great statesmen, serving their country with equally as great ability in civil life as they had served it in military life.

Not without thy wondrous story,
Illinois, Illinois!
Could be writ the nation's glory,
Illinois, Illinois!

What wonder we of Illinois are proud of that great State and of the great leaders she has given to the nation.

BENJAMIN F. MARSH was a friend and associate of Lincoln, and of Logan, and Oglesby, and the other great leaders of that time. With them he was endowed with a patriotic enthusiasm.

He was what you might call an enthusiastic patriot, who believed in his country and in its flag. He believed that his country was right, and even if his personal opinion happened to be different from the position taken by his country, he was willing yet to concede that the great majority was right and that his country must be right upon all great questions. He believed that it was, and he saw it grow into the greatest country on the face of the earth.

Reared upon the broad prairies of Illinois, coming to full manhood just as the great civil war broke out, when Illinois sent to the front more than 250,000 men to fight the battles of their country, he saw that war through to its conclusion and then he saw all the great events that have occurred in this country from that time down to less than a year ago, events never equaled before in the history of the world or of any other country or of any other land.

He was proud of his country; he was proud of its achievements, and he might well be, and he was enthusiastically for his country, first, last, and all the time.

When such a man passes from among us and from the scenes of earthly life, it brings us to the realization of the importance of doing while we may. He was a man who believed in doing things. He believed in action. That was one reason why he belonged to the Republican party, because that was a party that did things. It was the party that appealed to him. He had no use for a man who places over his mantle the skull and crossbones and writes underneath, "What is the use?" because he believed if we all took that position, advance would be impossible, and the great achievements of this country would never have occurred. He believed in action and in doing things well while we may. Up to the day of his death he was found as actively interested in all the great questions coming before this Government as any other man in public life.

I remember a little over a year ago of hearing him talk upon the subject of the United States Navy. While he was a man of peace, as gentle, as kindly as the immortal Lincoln, whom he loved and after whom he patterned, yet he believed that the great safeguard of human liberty and of maintaining the country's greatness and power was in time of peace to be prepared for war. Therefore he was an enthusiastic advocate of a greater navy, because he thought he saw therein the future safety of the Government.

He has gone from among us, Mr. Speaker, and no man who ever occupied a seat upon the floor of this House with him but what mourns his loss. We in Illinois who knew him better, who knew him during all the years of his active life, mourn necessarily more than others, because we knew him better. We knew him as he was at home—a pleasant, kindly, agreeable neighbor and friend, and as an honest man, the noblest work of God. A man who never intentionally did a wrong thing in his life, and who would not for any consideration on earth.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, there are great men in the world yet, there are honest men in the world yet, but there never was one more thoroughly honest and honorable in all things than Col. BENJAMIN F. MARSH.

As one by one the members of the old guard pass out of this life we are reminded of what a host of great names, names that will live in history, in song, and in story as long as time shall last, were developed and became known because of the great civil conflict between the States, and the acts done by these men during that conflict, and because of that conflict, and the great questions following in the settlement and adjustment of the affairs of the nation, for which they had risked their lives on the fields of carnage. The names of these heroes of the civil war will ever be dear to every patriotic man and woman in the land we love and for which they fought.

Colonel MARSH did his full share in that conflict, and since and up to the date of his death did his full share as a patriotic American citizen, whether in public office or private life. He is gone to the home provided for all those who love and serve their God and their country and who believe in their fellow-man. It has been said that Colonel MARSH did not believe in reformers. He did not, if by reformers is meant the breed of persons who see no good, and nothing but evil, in their fellow-men—those who pretend to believe that every man in public life is a thief and a scoundrel, and who advocate replacing them by men of their own kind; that is, they would reform everything on earth if the dear, good people would only let them have all the offices. But somehow or other the good, common-sense people of this great country have generally been too wise to trust that kind of men with the governing power of the country. I think they will not soon do so. I believe there are more good people than bad people in the world. I even believe there are more honest people than dishonest ones in public office to-day.

In fact, when you come to think of it, there is much truth in the saying that—

> There is so much bad in the best of us, and so much good in the worst of us, that it behooves all of us to be fairly charitable toward the rest of us.

I insist here and now that with all his positive convictions, all of his party fidelity, Colonel MARSH was a strictly, a ruggedly honest man in every relation of life, and that thousands of others in public life to-day are as honest, as patriotic, as unselfish, as devoted to their country, as he was.

This bright Easter Sunday we are reminded that the time will surely come to each and every one of us, as it came to Colonel MARSH, when we shall reach that dark flowing river of death, which we must all cross, and the farther side of which no man living has ever yet seen. When we reach its banks we can not stop; we must go on; we must cross to the farther shore. I think in our hearts we all believe we shall there meet our friends who have gone before. I think it was Whittier who said:

> Alas for him who never sees
> The stars shine through his cypress trees,
> Who hopeless lays his dead away,
> Nor looks to see the breaking day
> Across the mournful marbles play;
> Who hath not learned in times of faith
> The truth, to sense and flesh unknown,
> That life is ever lord of death,
> And love can never lose its own.

And again:

> For love will hope and faith will trust
> That somehow, somewhere, meet we must.

I believe we shall meet him again on some other shore, in some fairer land, where we shall all know each other better, where all the animosities of life here will be impossible, and where a wider and truer and better existence will be possible to all, at least who deserve it or have proven themselves worthy of it.

We mourn for our friend who has gone. Perhaps if we knew more we should not mourn. It is only the farewell, the eternal farewell, that hurts. To him we must bid that eternal good-by, hoping to meet him again. And in the sorrow of our hearts we say, "Peace to his ashes, rest to his soul."

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, death is the penalty all mortals must pay for the privilege of having breathed and moved in material form. Grace, strength, health, the glory of the world, the bud, the blossom, and the fruit of all mundane possibilities, "all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave," must blight, wither, and perish at the "grim monster's" pitiless touch. A sentiment of sincere sorrow pervades this Hall to-day, in the demise of this worthy man. His labors with us have ended. He fell at his post, ripe in years and full of honors. "After life's fitful fever he sleeps well." In a lonely grave in the far-distant West his body calmly slumbers. Upon his tomb the evening shades may fall heavily, "with night dews, cold and damp," but over it, too, the sunset will glow with purple and red, and the fleecy clouds roll by. Far above it will still shine the brilliant stars of heaven. While the seasons come and go, on this Easter morn we cherish his memory and will keep in bloom the fragrant flowers of deeds well done—of a career useful, honorable, and enduring.

It is an old Talmudic proverb that "When a good man dies, it is the earth that loses. The lost jewel will always be a jewel, but he who has lost it has just cause to weep." We mourn his loss, but it is a consolation to remember that his life is a rich mine from which the humblest actor can gather wealth.

He was shaped in the mold of early pioneer training on the wide undulating prairies of the great Northwest. His personality was rugged and gnarled like the giant oak, whose firm roots the tempest's blasts have driven deep down into rocky soil. Apparently without sentimentality he blended the common human traits of a humdrum, everyday existence with the sublimest and most unselfish discharge of the obligations of justice and humanity, and grew to manhood, in largest measure, a splendid specimen of a brave and fearless, a typical, American citizen. In business he was diligent and successful. In every earthly relation, wherever his lot was cast, he sought to do his duty, as he saw it, with the approval of a good conscience.

War, in itself a scourge, is not always an unmixed evil. In Bacon's phrase, it becomes sometimes "the highest trial of right." It tests the strongest and best elements of national character. It develops the physical and moral resources of a people. It brings from obscurity and seclusion into the searchlight of intersect public gaze sincere, self-sacrificing, inspired, and inspiring men who are raised up for a special occasion—men of destiny—born, as it were, for some opportune service or particular exigency, and fitted to sway the masses as with a magician's wand, to lead armies, meet contending foes on the red plains of Mars, and win such far-reaching victories as result in the subjugation or civilization of nations.

Such men are consecrated for leadership.

In the breast of the deceased, while living, burned the holy fires of patriotism.

In the storm of that fearful, fratricidal strife between the States he wore the blue. He fought his way from a private in the ranks to the command of a regiment in the field. No shame or disgrace ever stained his sword. His body, bearing the scars of four grievous gunshot wounds received in "battle's stern array," was a living witness to his loyalty and superb devotion to the "Star Spangled Banner." He shed his blood for the cause he believed to be right. Gentle in reverence, loyal in honor, simple in faith, self-poised, chivalric, quaint, disdaining appearances, of stern honesty and unimpeachable integrity, possessing varied attainments and extensive learning, considerate, conscientious, resourceful, with an aptitude for detail and a genius for hard work, yet, withal, a strong partisan, it was manifest that he had endowments which removed him from the sphere of the ordinary, which took him outside the pale of the commonplace and prosaic. His conduct at all times was such as to command respect and win admiration. As a logical sequence he was elected a Member of this Chamber, which has been described to be the greatest legislative body on the face of the globe.

Alabama's senior Senator in alluding to the vast volume of enactments by Congress, not only directly affecting the welfare of eighty-five millions of people, but influencing the councils of kingdoms and determining the fate of empires, has declared:

> The House of Representatives of the people is not less powerful than the greatest tribunals that have ever assembled. The scope and majestic sovereignty of this power is beyond description in words, or by any reference to other systems of government.

The confidence and esteem of his neighbors and friends—of the constituency he loved and honored, and who, in turn, loved and honored him—attested their appreciation of the efficient manner in which he discharged his Congressional duties, numerous, varied, and exacting. There was nothing negative in his nature. His locality could always be ascertained. Dignified in bearing, of sound practical sense, having his own individual, independent, and uncompromising methods of thought, of liberal views and public spirit, he was in every respect eminently qualified for the lofty trust he so long and ably filled as a Representative in the lower House of Congress.

From a character so exemplary the young men of our country can find inspiration and take renewed encouragement.

Colonel Marsh is dead. He departed from the walks of men just as the clock of time, pointing with unerring finger to high noon, struck that "inevitable hour," upon which the "boast of heraldry and the pomp of power" alike must wait.

From his labors here he has been called away for rest and recreation. We do not believe, to quote the graphic words of the immortal Shakspeare, that he has gone to a "blind cave of eternal night." The spark of a noble life flickered a little while, and then went out. The lute is silent. The chords made of his heartstrings are broken. While with us all the "sense of death is most in apprehension," as the poet has aptly expressed it, we feel justified in indulging the buoyant hope that he has been translated to a brighter and better home beyond the grave, where the air is filled with solemn, entrancing music, and the sky is aglow with the splendor of sunlight and perpetual spring; where the rumbling waters are dashed with the fragrance of rare and beautiful flowers, and the garlands, woven from the lilies of the valley, are forever white and green.

Let him rest and sleep and dream! Upon the marble slab which crowns the mound where his remains lie buried we place with tender hands "clusters of beauty whom none can debar," the choicest roses culled from the garden of love, "white as the robe of a sinless one and sweeter than Araby's winds that blow"—the last and purest token affection can offer to our departed friend and brother.

"Light be the turf of thy tomb!"—old man,
"May its verdure like emeralds be;
There should not be the shadow of gloom
In aught that reminds us of thee.
Young flowers and an evergreen tree
May spring from the spot of thy rest,
But not cypress nor yew let us see;
For let us not mourn for the blest."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I come to pay a brief tribute to the memory of a man whom I loved. BENJAMIN F. MARSH was my friend; between us a warm personal friendship had existed for years. I knew his temperament and he knew my temperament. Our esteem for each other was deep and sincere. The announcement of his death was to me a terrible blow.

I do not propose to speak at any length of his Congressional attainments or of the many salutary measures he helped to enact into law. Those of you who served with him here in this House can best testify to his worth and greatness as a legislator. It is to his splendid character, his noble manhood, and his loving disposition that I wish to address myself.

BENJAMIN F. MARSH was not one of those men with whom an easy acquaintance and lasting friendship could be secured at first meeting. He did not impress favorably most of his acquaintances at first appearance. His stern features rendered him liable to the imputation of indifference to friendly offices, and yet it was but the appearance of coldness. No man with whom I have ever had an intimate acquaintance possessed to a greater degree those traits of friendship and generosity which make the lives of some men so peculiarly sweet and beautiful.

No constituency was represented in Congress by a more conscientious man than BEN MARSH. Of this I am absolutely certain, although I did not have the pleasure of serving with him. He was constant, industrious, and painstaking. He was an effective worker. He had the confidence of his associates. He never flinched from disagreeable duties. He was intensely patriotic. His love for his country could not be estimated. He was broad in his conceptions and firm in his convictions. He was magnetic. He was chivalrous. He was courteous. Truth, love, courage, and intelligence were indelibly stamped upon his strong, but lovable, face. Aside from all this, he was gallant. No one ever doubted his sincerity and courage.

Colonel MARSH was born on a farm in Hancock County, Ill. He received his early education in the pulic schools of that neighborhood. He subsequently studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1860. He served continuously in the war of the rebellion from 1861 to 1865, and gained great distinction for bravery on the field of battle. From 1866 to 1877 he resumed the practice of law. He was elected to the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, Fifty-third, Fifty-fourth, Fifty-fifth, Fifty-sixth, Fifty-eighth, and Fifty-ninth Congresses.

I am told by his associates here that he made an ideal Congressman; that he did not attempt by much speechmaking to sway the minds of his hearers, but that he possessed to a prominent degree the art of presenting in conversation his ideas in such logical manner as to show that he was richly endowed with those faculties without which his success could not have been so pronounced.

He was no diplomat. If he could not win by hard knocks delivered straight from the shoulder, he was willing to lose. He never fouled his enemy, nor did he believe in compromise. He believed in just and beneficent legislation, but once lending his support to a measure he believed to be right, he would not willingly tolerate amendment.

He was a man of action. He was bold, fearless, sincere, and honest. He was beloved as a friend and feared as an enemy.

In private life he was cordial, affable, genial, hospitable, sympathetic, and agreeable. That he was always clear and always true can be testified to by hundreds of Illinoisans who have gone to him for advice and aid in times of trouble. His heart was as kind and sympathetic as ever beat in human bosom. It was impossible for him to say no when appealed to for assistance by worthy ones in need.

In his death this House has lost one of its foremost Members and Illinois one of its purest and best men.

Life! I know not what thou art,
But this I know, that thou and I must part;
And when or where or how we met,
I own to me's a secret yet.

Life! we've been long together,
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather;
'Tis hard to part when friends are dear;
Perhaps 'twill cost a sigh, a tear;
Then steal away, give little warning;
Choose thine own time;
Say not "Good night;" but in some brighter clime
Bid me "Good morning."

[Mr. WILSON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Then (at 1 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.), in accordance with the order already made in the adoption of the resolution, the House adjourned until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock m.

JOHN B. LEE.

Mr. SCOTT. On behalf of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON], I report back from the Committee on Pensions the bill (S. 4760) granting an increase of pension to John B. Lee, with an amendment, and I submit a report thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] to the bill.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, this is a distressing case. Relief will have to be granted soon, if at all. Therefore I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from West Virginia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, in line 6, before the word "Company," to strike out "of" and insert "captain;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John B. Lee, late captain Company D, Fourth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. TILLMAN. I send to the desk a resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to inquire whether or not the national banks have made contributions in aid of political committees, and if so, to what extent, and why the facts have not been discovered by the Comptroller of the Currency; and whether or not such contributions have been embezzlements, abstractions, or willful misapplications of the funds of the banks which call for restitutions and criminal prosecutions. Said committee is also directed to inquire whether or not the national banks of Chicago have recently engaged in transactions beyond their lawful powers in connection with the recent failure of a bank in that city, and whether such failure involved illegalities and crimes; and also to inquire whether the national banks in Ohio have been in the habit of paying large sums of money in a secret and illicit manner to the county treasurers of Ohio as a compensation to said treasurers for making deposits of public money with such banks; and to report the facts to the Senate, and the opinion of the committee whether any legal proceedings should be instituted on account of the transactions disclosed, and whether the public interest requires any amendments of the existing national banking laws.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the resolution go over until to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the resolution will lie over.

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was read:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
April 16, 1906.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill H. R. 5976, "An act to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," the Clerk be directed to restore to the bill the part proposed to be stricken out in the amendment of the Senate No. 26 and to insert the following: On page 9, line 3, after the word "retaining," the words "tribal educational officers, subject to dismissal by the Secretary of the Interior," and restore to the bill the part proposed to be stricken out in the amendment of the Senate No. 27, and to insert in said amendment the following: On page 11, line 8, after the word "five," the words "and all such taxes levied and collected after the 31st day of December, 1905, shall be refunded."

After the word "shall," on page 11, line 16, insert "willfully and fraudulently."

After the word "punished," on page 11, line 21, insert "by a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out in the amendment of the Senate No. 41 insert in lieu thereof the following: "The Secretary of the Interior shall take possession of all buildings now or heretofore used for governmental, school, and other tribal purposes, together with the furniture therein and the land appertaining thereto, and appraise and sell the same at such time and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and deposit the proceeds, less expenses incident to the appraisement and sale, in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the respective tribes: Provided,"

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the resolution had better go over. I shall want to examine the bill in connection with the proposed resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will lie upon the table.

JAMES W. JONES.

Mr. HEYBURN obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Idaho yields to me for the purpose of saying that I objected on Friday last to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6982) for the relief of James W. Jones. The bill was read. I withdraw my objection and trust the bill may be passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to James W. Jones $513.71. Said James W. Jones, a clerk of class 1 in the office of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department, was, on February 25, 1898, erroneously arrested and summarily dismissed on February 26, 1898.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the railroad rate bill be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, on a former occasion I suggested that a phase of the bill under consideration which I deemed very important has not as yet received that attention which it seemed to me should be given to it, and that is the right of the shipper or producer. I desire to premise my remarks by a statement of the principles which I think underlie it.

The right of the producer and shipper to share in the services of the common carrier is property as much as the right of the common carrier to charge for such services. The principle of just and reasonable compensation for such service applies to both alike. The question of just and reasonable regulations and conditions of transportation apply to each alike. If one is under the protection of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, the other is equally so.

With that statement of what I deem to be incontrovertible truths I should like to review the proposed legislation for the purpose of determining whether or not it meets the requirements of those principles. I propose to-day to waive the question as to constitutional limitation. The principles that I have suggested are as true and as applicable under one interpretation of the powers and limitation of the Government in any of its branches as under the other. It resolves itself down to a question at this time not of what we may do, because it will be admitted by all parties to this controversy that we may do what I propose to do by this amendment, so that the question confronting us is not the limiting of our powers, but the extent to which we will exercise them. There is a vast margin within which Congress may legislate without infringing upon the constitution or the rights of the people.

Mr. President, I would call attention at this period to the fact that I have had a reprint of my amendment, and it is with the clerks and can be had of them. The amendment as I originally offered it covered some things that I do not desire to cover by it, and was not drawn with that fullness as to detail which I now desire. I have therefore had it reprinted, and it may now be had by any Senator who desires to have it before him.

I shall first analyze this amendment and present it in detail to the Senate, and I shall then take up the several amendments that have been offered as to the provision concerning the right of repeal for the purpose of inquiring whether or not they go far enough to accomplish the purpose which I have stated on behalf of the complaining party—that is, the protection of the rights of the producer and shipper.

First, the amendment provides that—

Whenever any party shall have made complaint in the manner herein provided to the Interstate Commerce Commission against any common carrier charging such common carrier with charging or demanding of such complaining party an unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, preferential, or prejudicial rate, or establishing any unjust or unreasonable charge or practice, for or in connection with the transportation of any proper subject of interstate commerce, which such complaining party has offered or may offer or may desire to offer, for transportation by the said common carrier, and the said Interstate Commerce Commission shall make and enter a decision against the claim made by such complaining party in regard to the matter complained of or against such common carrier, then such complaining party or such common carrier may cause the decision of said Commission to be reviewed by the United States circuit court sitting in the district in which the said cause of complaint has arisen, together with all the proceedings had before such Interstate Commerce Commission, relative to the said complaint, which decisions and proceedings, upon the demand of the complaining party, or such common carrier, shall be duly certified by the Interstate Commerce Commission to the United States circuit court aforesaid for review therein—

Just the proceedings that were had before the Commission may be certified to the United States circuit court upon the application of either the complaining party or the party against whom the complaint was laid—and said proceedings, so certified, shall constitute the record to be reviewed, considered, and passed upon by the said circuit court, and a certified copy of such decision and record, together with a notice in writing of the intention to cause such proceedings to be reviewed in said circuit court, shall be served upon said Commission and upon the common carrier against whom such complaint shall have been made, or upon such complainant, as the case may be, within thirty days from the making of the order to be reviewed—

That constitutes the subject upon which the review rests. Then—

Such service may be made by any person of lawful age acting for the party seeking the review and may be made upon any member of the Interstate Commerce Commission and upon any officer, agent, or attorney of said common carrier when such common carrier is a corporation, or upon any common carrier a party to such proceedings or the attorney of such common carrier or upon such complainant—

That is the equivalent of a summons or a subpœna that brings the parties before the court—

That the circuit courts of the United States shall have and exercise jurisdiction to review any final decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission establishing rates or conditions regulating interstate commerce under the provisions of this act—

That gives the court the jurisdiction, and we are thus relieved of the question as to whether or not, and to what extent, they have jurisdiction in the absence of any specific provision in the legislative enactment or under the Constitution—

The jurisdiction of said circuit courts to review such proceedings shall attach upon the filing therein of a certified copy of the proceedings had before the Interstate Commerce Commission, together with affidavit of service of said certified record of the proceedings had before the Commission and of the notice of intention to review said decision in said circuit court as in this section provided, which said certified proceedings shall constitute all the record upon which said review may be had—

It will be observed there that this differs from several of the amendments which have been offered in that it limits the record upon which the circuit court shall determine the controverted questions on a review of the proceedings of law and fact had before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it puts the Interstate Commerce Commission in the position of a master in chancery appointed to hear and report the law and the facts of a case—

And upon the filing of such certified records, with notice of the service of the same as above provided, the jurisdiction of said circuit court shall fully attach for the purpose of determining all questions of law and fact presented by said record—

Limiting the consideration by the circuit court to the record which is made by the Interstate Commerce Commission—and the court is empowered and authorized upon such review, in the event that it shall find upon the record that the rate complained of is either unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, preferential, or prejudicial, or that the charge or practice complained of is unjust or unreasonable, to fix and determine such a rate—

That is, the circuit court shall fix the rate or practice on review of the Commission's decision—or practice as in its judgment shall be just, reasonable, and not discriminatory, preferential, or prejudicial—

That is what the court said that they did not have the power to do under the existing law. This provision gives them the power to do what they said they would do had they the power—and shall by such order—

That is, the court shall—and shall by such order and the execution thereof prevent any unjust or unreasonable practice in connection with such transportation, and shall enter its judgment therein according to the law and the premises—

Having before it the record made before the Commission and nothing else—no trial de novo; nothing added to that record except the papers necessary to bring the case up for review—they may declare upon that record whether or not the rate fixed is just and reasonable, and so forth; and, if it is not, they may declare a just and reasonable rate. We can either give them that power or we might as well dismiss this proposed legislation from our minds. If we can not give to the court that power upon review, then all of this argument, all of the discussion of this question, has been to no purpose. The only alternative would be for the courts to send it back and back again to the Commission for further action on their part. We must give the court that reviews the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission this power or the legislation will accomplish no purpose.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Idaho a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Can the United States circuit court review such a case as the Senator refers to, except by an original action commenced in that court?

Mr. HEYBURN. The United States circuit court may take jurisdiction in such manner as we prescribe in this amendment, and it may apply its judicial power to the determination of any matter thus brought before it or within its jurisdiction. We have a number of precedents for this class of review, one of which is afforded in the text of the present interstate-commerce law—that is to say, to provide for the review of a record made by an executive body by legislative action of Congress and say that jurisdiction shall attach upon the filing of the record of the legislative body. It is not an appeal. There could be no appeal from a legislative or executive body to a court. But it authorizes the jurisdiction of the United States courts to take hold of a controversy which has been prepared for final determination before an executive board.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. If I understand this amendment which the Senator from Idaho has proposed to the bill, he proposes to authorize the courts on review, at the instance of a shipper dissatisfied with the orders of the Commission, to ascertain and determine what is a reasonable rate or order to be made in the matter in question. Is that correct?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. I propose to authorize them to do so in the process of reviewing the action taken by the administrative board.

Mr. FULTON. It seems to me—I have only looked over the amendment hurriedly—that the inquiry for that purpose is confined to a review on an appeal or application of the shipper, is it not?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; it is not. Has the Senator a copy of the reprint of the bill?

Mr. FULTON. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator will find that the parties have exactly equal rights in regard to every step of the proceedings in connection with the determination of what is just and fair compensation or any other controverted question.

Mr. FULTON. Do I understand the Senator correctly that on a review initiated by either party, the carrier or the shipper, he proposes to require the court, if it hears the appeal from the Commission, to ascertain and determine and pronounce what is a reasonable rate or regulation in that case?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do. I propose to allow the courts to protect both parties under the provisions of the fifth amendment of the Constitution of the United States. But I do not intend to enter into any further analysis of what may be done under that fifth amendment than may be necessary to apply the provisions in my amendment to the principle of law involved in it.

Mr. FULTON. I only asked the Senator the question in order that I might be certain that my understanding of his amendment is correct. I wish to say that I am heartily in favor of that feature of the amendment. I myself believe that when an appeal is taken from an order of the board, and the court annuls the order made by the Commission either fixing the rate or establishing a practice, the court should be required to go further and say what is a reasonable rate or a proper practice.

Mr. HEYBURN. And my amendment so provides. Then, as to the manner of its execution——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. If I understand the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON], it is to the effect that the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] proposes that the court in reviewing the action of the Commission, if it shall find that action to have been unsatisfactory or invalid for any of the reasons mentioned, shall not only set that aside, but that it shall go further and fix the rate. Is that correct?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is correct.

Mr. BACON. Now, I want to ask the Senator a question somewhat of a constitutional character, not for the purpose of controversy, but for the purpose of getting the Senator's view. Of course the Senator will recognize the fact that when the Commission fixes the rate it will be doing so in the exercise of its delegated power; in other words, the original power to make a rate is in Congress, and Congress delegates that to the Commission. I presume the Senator agrees with me to that extent. Predicated upon that, I desire to ask the Senator this question: Suppose, instead of delegating the power to fix the rate, Congress should itself fix the rate; could Congress go further and say that the court should have the right to review that rate and say whether or not Congress had fixed it properly?

Mr. HEYBURN. That depends, Mr. President, on whether or not the provision of the act of Congress includes a rule by which the rate can be fixed by a commission.

Mr. BACON. The Senator does not understand me.

Mr. HEYBURN. We are not proposing, if I may complete my suggestion, to give the Interstate Commerce Commission a free hand in the fixing of rates. We propose that they shall fix such rates as shall be just and reasonable; and it is recognized doctrine that the meaning of those terms can be determined only by the court. So that we can not possibly divorce the proceeding under the "just and reasonable" clause from the power which we give the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the rate.

Mr. BACON. The Senator, I fear, did not catch my exact meaning, and, therefore, with his permission, I will repeat my question in a somewhat different form. In the absence of delegation, suppose that the Congress should assume, what we all recognize to be within its power, to itself fix a rate, could we constitutionally attach to and as a part of the act fixing the rate a provision that the court should have the power to review the action of Congress in fixing the rate; and if it is found to be not valid for any reason specified in this amendment, that it should set that rate aside and itself fix the rate? Could we delegate to the court the power to review that action of Congress?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not regard it as necessary to consider the question of whether we could delegate the power to the court or not, because the principle of delegation is not involved. If Congress should itself fix the rate, and that action by Congress should be in violation of property rights protected by the organic law of the land, the court could say that Congress had fixed a rate that amounted to a violation of individual or property rights. We can give to the Supreme Court or to any other court the power, if we see fit, to suggest to us a rate that would not do so by judicially interpreting the meaning of "just and reasonable." Otherwise what did the Supreme Court mean when it said that "While this question is before us Congress might have given the power, but Congress has not given it. All we can do, therefore, is to say that the rate is not itself illegal; we can reverse the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and there our power stops." What did the Supreme Court mean by that?

Mr. BACON. The Senator need not argue that proposition, because so far as it recognizes the power of courts to set aside legislation violating property rights nobody would differ with him about it.

Mr. HEYBURN. It seems to me——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him—I do not wish to do so unless it be agreeable to him——

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not object to being interrupted.

Mr. BACON. The Senator interjects a statement right in the midst of my statement; and if he will pardon me, in order that I may set myself right——

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me a moment?

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will permit me to make my suggestion.

Mr. FULTON. It is right in connection with the question he is going to ask, if I understand the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I am asking a question, and I hope the Senator will permit me to finish it.

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Nobody will for a moment take issue with the Senator in what he says, that, if Congress should pass an act which was unconstitutional, the court would so determine; but what I desire to ask the Senator is this: If Congress should fix a rate—leaving the Interstate Commerce Commission out of the question—if Congress should fix a rate, could we say in the act fixing that rate that, if there was anything in it which the parties found to be "unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, preferential, or prejudicial," the court should have the power to revise that and change it and fix a rate which would not be open to those objections?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; unqualifiedly so. We have done that in many instances.

Mr. BACON. I am asking about the Senator's amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will answer the suggestion of the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I am quoting the language of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have been quoting the language of the amendment. We have done that——

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator will pardon me for just a moment.

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator from Georgia answer a question?

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to answer the question which the Senator propounded to me.

Mr. FULTON. It is right in connection with that.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, I will answer both together.

Mr. FULTON. That is what I want.

Mr. HEYBURN. All right.

Mr. FULTON. What I want to ask the Senator from Georgia is this: If there is any difference in the exercise of the power on the part of Congress, whether it fixes the rate itself or commits it to a commission under proper instructions; in other words, when it directs the Commission to fix the rate, is not that the action of Congress, and if not, is it not a void act?

Mr. HEYBURN. The answer to both of those questions is just this: Congress has from the beginning been doing just what it is proposed to do by this amendment. The land laws of the United States lay down a general principle. They leave the execution and administration of the law to a Department of the Government, and provide that it shall be done under such rules and regulations as, in the judgment of the Department or the officer of the Department, will accomplish the ultimate purpose that Congress had in enacting the law. That is one instance. In the case of the location of a mining claim, the law says that the claim shall be so distinctly marked upon the ground that its boundaries can be readily traced; and the courts are left to say whether or not the parties have complied with it.

Here we say to a department of the Government, corresponding in many ways to the Land Department: "Within certain lines and within certain general limitations you may determine these questions of fact." They are questions of fact that the department is to determine—whether or not certain conditions stated constitute a violation of what is right or reasonable or just, just as the other department is delegated with authority to say whether or not certain conditions upon the ground constitute the carving out of an estate that may be of vast value or of none; for we propose that Congress shall by this legislation delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to take up the facts that are presented in the petition of the complaining party, sift them, apply the law to them, and determine whether or not, in the judgment of the Commission, the acts complained of are in accord with or in violation of the law, and render its decision, which is equivalent to a judgment. That is what we propose they shall do. They say that the lawful rate or the reasonable rate or the just rate is $2 a ton, and that is based upon the facts before them. They have no jurisdiction to determine until after the statement of the facts is before them. Those facts being before the Commission, upon such facts they draw a deduction as to the right and the wrong—that is the right of the party. Can we authorize the court to review it? The courts have been reviewing that class of controversy every day since this Government was founded, and it is one of the most constant sources of the courts' jurisdiction.

Mr. President, I am not troubled about the power of Congress to authorize the United States circuit court to review the law or the facts, or the facts and the law, because the law flows from the facts. As proposed by my amendment, in these cases a complaining party, dissatisfied with the rate or with the conditions surrounding him, states the facts and not the law or the conclusions to be drawn from them; he states the facts to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that Commission, taking those facts and applying the law as it understands it, says, "You are right," or thus and so. They are authorized through the machinery of the court to enforce their decisions. Can there be any doubt about the power to do that?

Let us see what the amendment which I propose provides in regard to the manner of the exercise of that power. I last referred to the provision at the bottom of page 3 of the amendment, that the court should review the question of whether or not these rates were discriminatory, etc.—

And shall by such order and the execution thereof—

That is, the United States circuit court shall—prevent any unjust or unreasonable practice in connection with such transportation, and shall enter its judgment therein according to the law and the premises.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I interrupt the Senator to ask a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to ask the Senator what does he mean by the words "such transportation?" Does he mean the particular transportation that is involved in the particular case that is complained of?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator—for I am in sympathy with the appeal by the shipper as well as by the common carrier from every decision—whether or not the Senator contends that the court can be compelled to determine, not only whether this rate is unreasonable and unjust, but also can be compelled to determine what is an unjust and an unreasonable rate—that is, that Congress has the power to say to the court, "You shall not only determine the specific question whether it is unjust or unreasonable, but shall lay down a rule of what shall constitute an unreasonable and an unjust rate?"

Mr. HEYBURN. Is that the Senator's point?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Congress could not, if it would, provide that a judgment might be rendered against any party that was not in court; and I have taken especial care in this amendment to limit the application of those words on the first page of the amendment—I call the Senator's attention to it—"when such complaining party has offered, or may offer, or may desire to offer for transportation by said common carrier any proper subject of interstate commerce." That limitation runs all through the amendment. I have not thought for a moment that a court could lay down a rule that would be binding upon a party not before it; but I do believe, as a matter of practice, when the court makes a rule people will acquiesce in it, because they would know that it would be entirely futile and a source of expense to them to take up a case resting upon a principle that had already been determined by the court to again hear it. They could only possibly be induced to do it for the purpose of harassing some one, and they would get very tired of that by the time the court applied the rule that governs frivolous appeals.

Mr. McCUMBER. The real question that I wanted information upon was whether the Senator's contention was that in a case where the rate, we will say, is 5 cents a hundred for shipment between points, and the court may determine that that 5 cents per hundred is unreasonable, has Congress any power to compel the court to say that 3 or 3½ cents would be reasonable, and compel it to render a decision of that kind and incorporate it as a part of its decision, and then to enforce a rule or order in that particular case that the common carrier should only charge 3 or 3½ cents if it should find that to be the limit of a reasonable charge?

Mr. HEYBURN. I should say that I do not exactly agree with the Senator as to the use of the term we may "compel" a court to do a thing. A court might stubbornly refuse to do anything in any case. The court will not probably refuse in these cases to do what Congress has legislated they may do. It is not to be presumed that they would refuse to do it if we provide as a part of this scheme of legislation that it shall be the duty of the court—not that the court may do it, but that it shall be the duty of the court—upon the record before it to determine these things. It only remains a question as to whether or not we have the power to do it; and that I have already passed. I do not think there is any objection to the effect that we have no power to do it. As I say, we have been doing it, and the statutes are full of instances in which we give the court just such duties to perform.

But, Mr. President, my amendment continues, and here comes in the manner of exercising the power—and the hearing and consideration of such cases by the said circuit court shall be without any avoidable delay and such cases shall have priority in hearing and determination over all other cases except criminal cases.

That is the usual, useful, and necessary provision in this class of cases, because it relieves the court of embarrassment. When these cases are on the calendar the court may simply say, "Under the statute by which we take jurisdiction in this case it is entitled to a preference over all other controversies except criminal cases."

That the said circuit court shall have power to execute its orders and decrees and to make, issue, and enforce all necessary interlocutory orders and writs for the preservation of the rights of the parties litigant pending the hearing and determination of the review of the proceedings of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mark you, it "shall have power to execute its orders and decrees and to make, issue, and enforce" them. We do not say that they shall issue any writ; we do not say that they shall not. We say we commit to the chancellor of the court, the man whose judgment is the exercise of a conscience not bounded by the rules or precepts or limitations surrounding statutory rights and remedies; but a court, whether it be the same man or another, who acts only on conscience under his oath; and we know that in the record of the jurisprudence of this country, of our mother country, and of the civilization of the world it has been very seldom indeed that in the last analysis we have been justified in criticising the acts of the great chancellors in whom we have rested our faith. So this leaves it to them. I do not believe that any conscientious chancellor will stay a proceeding except upon good cause shown. Now, mark you:

Provided, That no order or writ shall be made suspending the operation of the order under review, except upon the party asking for such order giving an indemnity bond in such sum as the court or judge thereof may direct, or depositing the amount of such indemnity with the court, subject to its order.

That is the general provision. The courts do not grant injunctions, except under the rarest circumstances, without requiring indemnity that would be adequate to meet any possible loss. Then:

And the liability under such indemnity bond or deposit shall cover the costs of the hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission and the review thereof by the circuit or Supreme Court, together with the amount of money involved in the controversy to be reviewed—and a reasonable attorney fee to be fixed by the court.

I did not have that clause in this amendment when I first drew it. I had some doubt about the justice of including the attorney's fee in this class of cases; but, upon reviewing the bill before us and the amendments, I found that it seemed to be generally accepted that we should include an attorney's fee. I have no particular objection to it, because I think the court would always keep it within reasonable bounds.

And no stay of the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be allowed under any order or writ made or issued by the circuit court for a period of more than sixty days, at the expiration of which time, should the parties seeking to have the proceedings of the Interstate Commerce Commission reviewed desire a further stay, they must show to the said court or judge thereof that they have been and are exercising due diligence in the preparation and prosecution of the action, and that injustice would result from the refusal to grant such extension of time.

That is for protection against delay. If they make a showing in the first place upon which the chancellor will stay the proceeding, within sixty days, or at the end of sixty days, that stay falls, unless they come before the court and show—as they ought to be compelled to do, especially in mining litigation—they come before the court and show a reasonable excuse why their case has not come to a final consideration. Any chancellor, inspired with a sense of equity and justice, would say upon a proper showing, "Your stay will be extended for thirty days or sixty days," as the case may be, leaving it always within the power of the chancellor, where there is an evident purpose of delay, to compel the parties to come to a speedy determination.

I am endeavoring by this amendment to provide a remedy and such a method for the application and enforcement of the remedy as will be in harmony with the recognized system of chancery practice in the United States courts—an application of the present rules of procedure to this case after the court has jurisdiction of it.

Mr. President, I did not intend and I do not now intend to read all of this amendment, but I desire to go over it in this way in order to impress upon the minds of the Senate its provisions and the necessity therefor that occurred to my mind for presenting them. I did not draw this amendment simply to draw an amendment to this bill, but to give such aid as is due from every member of this body to the end that we may frame a law that will be in accord with our powers and our duties.

The amendment then provides—

That the circuit court having jurisdiction of the cause shall at all times be open for any purpose or proceeding.

Then I make the usual provision that it shall be open without regard to term time. Such a provision is necessary because the time within which the case may be reviewed is so short that if it were not that the courts were deemed always open, it would be impossible to comply with the ordinary rules of practice of the court.

That the decisions of the United States circuit courts upon a review of any of the proceedings of the Interstate Commerce Commission as aforesaid, or of any matter pertaining thereto, shall be final, except that whenever it shall be made to appear by verified petition to the Supreme Court of the United States or to a justice thereof, accompanied by a certified copy of the record upon which the final judgment of the circuit court is based, that any of the rights of the contesting parties under the Constitution of the United States have been violated by a denial of such rights of the parties to such controversy by the order, judgment, or decree under review, then and in that case the Supreme Court or a justice thereof may, by appropriate order or writ, cause the record of the proceedings of the said circuit court to be certified to the Supreme Court of the United States for review thereby—

Taking them up by the ordinary process of certiorari or a writ the equivalent of it, and taking up to that court only the question involving the rights of the parties under the Constitution to their property and their personal enjoyment thereof.

In the circuit court it is provided by this amendment that the court may review both law and fact and determine the question as though it came before it upon the report of a master in chancery. But in reviewing the action of the circuit court it is not necessary that these cases should be thrown into the Supreme Court of the United States at the whim of either party for a determination of the facts, or for any further purpose than that the fundamental rights of the parties to the controversy may be considered in their relation to the constitutional rights of property and person.

Now, Mr. President, the amendment goes on to provide that—

The Supreme Court shall have the power to make such orders and issue such writs as in its judgment are appropriate and necessary to protect the rights of the parties litigant pending the hearing and determination of the cause to the same extent as is herein provided in this behalf during the pendency of the review of such cause in the circuit court.

In other words, it gives the United States Supreme Court the power to continue in force protective orders at its discretion. It obviates the consideration of the question whether they have that right regardless of the statute or can have it only by statute. I can accept every word that was said by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] as to their not having it except we give it to them. I can with good conscience stand here and urge upon the Senate our duty to give it to them. He admits we have the power to give them this right of review, and denies to them the power unless we give it to them; and I propose that we give them the power and leave no doubt about that question, but give it to them with the limitation as to the exercise of the jurisdiction.

The amendment contains further provisions with respect to the proceedings for the review of the judgment of the circuit court by the Supreme Court. It has now become a decree, or a judgment in the circuit court. It may be a judgment for money, and that the circuit court will give the parties the right of trial by jury. The existing law is sufficient to regulate that matter. The amendment deals with the appeal from the circuit court as with any other appeal. It denominates the review of the action of the board as a "review." We may create new writs in Congress. Congress, while recognizing the writs known at the common law and in chancery practice, may provide for the institution of new methods of review. We did it in the act of 1891, creating the circuit courts of appeals, where we provided an entirely new and distinctive method of transferring a cause from one court to another for the purpose of review, and it is within our power, beyond a question, to authorize the transfer of the controversy, after a decision, from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the circuit court. But after that, in proceeding from one court to another, there is no embarrassment. It is by appeal with all the attributes of an established method.

This amendment further provides that—

The proceedings for the review of the judgment of the circuit court by the Supreme Court, whether by appeal or otherwise.

It might be by certiorari; a question of jurisdiction might be raised, and it might be by writ of error, where the judgment of the circuit court was for damages; and, as I have already said, the circuit court might award a jury trial where the question came within the common-law jurisdiction of the circuit court.

The amendment provides—

That the proceedings for the review of the judgment of the circuit court by the Supreme Court, whether by appeal or otherwise, shall be commenced therein by filing a certified transcript of the record, proceedings, and judgment or decree had in the circuit court in said cause with the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States—

That is the usual way. It would not have been necessary to provide herein for it, except that it fills out and harmonizes a method of procedure that was intended to be complete in this amendment—within thirty days—

That is time enough. The record is made up, and in this age of duplicating records by typewriting and other processes it is not necessary to provide for those long intervals between the trial of a case and the making up of the record that it formerly was. So I have thought here that thirty days was a sufficient lapse of time between the decision of the Commission and the presenting of the record to the Supreme Court—within thirty days after the entry of such judgment by the said circuit court, and that thereafter the consideration by the Supreme Court of the United States of such causes shall have priority in hearing and determination over all other causes, except criminal causes, but the pendency of such review or appeal in the Supreme Court of the United States shall not vacate or suspend the order appealed from, except in the manner or under the conditions as hereinbefore provided in the case of the proceedings in the circuit court to review the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

That is to say, sixty days is the limit of supersedeas except upon a showing of necessity that would appeal to the court for further time.

That any order made by the Interstate Commerce Commission fixing or regulating interstate traffic rates, or any matters pertaining thereto under the authority vested in said Commission by law, shall be in force from time of the making of such order by the said Commission, and shall only be suspended in the manner hereinbefore provided.

A judgment is in force from the time of docketing it. Why should not these orders be in force? Who is benefited by this delay of thirty days, postponing the effect of an order thirty days, when you give the direct and prompt right of review, and they can take advantage of this right of review should they see fit to do so within twenty-four hours after the decision? I have known reports of masters in chancery to be before the court on the day they were made. Why do we need a lapse of thirty days between the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the time when the order shall go into effect?

That any order made * * * shall be in force from time of the making of such order by the said Commission, and shall only be suspended in the manner hereinbefore provided.

That is all there is of this amendment, and I submit to the Senate that it constitutes a complete provision and method of procedure for the review of the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission which is in accord with the present practice of United States courts, and violates no rule of those courts and no statute governing the right of review of any court.

Mr. President, so much for that amendment which I commend to the Senate for its consideration. It is in behalf of the people at whose original demand the interstate-commerce bill was passed. The railroads did not demand the passage of an interstate-commerce bill in 1887 or at any time. It was the producers and the shippers of the country who demanded it. One might think from much that we read and some that we hear that this is a question of seeing how much we may encroach upon the rights of the common carrier as between the Commission and the carrier. The Commission is merely a board of arbitration. We could not, should we deem it desirable to do so, invest it with any greater powers than those belonging to a board of arbitration. It is merely, and should be, a convenience for the purpose of enabling the complainant to reach into a court.

Of course if both parties were satisfied with the decision of the arbitrator, there would be no occasion for going into court, but generally they are not. More than half of the cases decided in the last five years by the Interstate Commerce Commission were decided against the complainants. More than half of the formal complaints that were submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon which testimony was taken and hearings had, were decided against the producer, who sometimes is the shipper and sometimes is not the shipper. But for convenience of expression I speak of him as the shipper. Was he never right? Can it be possible that in so large a proportion of the controversies submitted by complaint to that body the shipper was never right? Does the record establish the infallibility of the judgment of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the extent that we can believe that those complaints were turned down because they had no merit? Out of twenty-seven cases that have been appealed from the Commission the Commission has been turned down twenty times. It was right seven times out of twenty-seven.

Now I say that without any disrespect personally to the Board. I say it because it is a fact which ought to be taken into consideration in determining the weight and the conclusiveness which we will attach to the decisions of the Commission in weighing the rights of those who make complaints before it. It is not a question of protecting either the Commission or the common carrier alone. They should both be protected within the limits of fairness and reason. But the primary object of the interstate-commerce legislation was to protect the very party who was left out of the interstate-commerce bill. He has been treated with suspicion from the very beginning. Section 9 of the existing law contains the provision that if the complainant elects to submit his case to the Interstate Commerce Commission, he does it at the jeopardy of waiving his rights under the common law to recover damages to the extent of his losses. Was ever such a provision incorporated in a bill that claimed to have been enacted for the protection of the shipper? Pass a law, ostensibly granting him some right to protection, and then say, "You can have this, but only in case you are willing to throw yourself with perfect faith and trust into the arms of the Commission for the ultimate decision of your rights," and then waive a right that was more valuable to him before the enactment of any law than any right that the law pretends to give him—the right to sue in the courts of the State or of the United States to recover back any sums that had been unjustly collected from him by the transportation company.

Common carriers have been recognized since the beginning of written and unwritten history as necessary to every community. I have wondered sometimes, as I sat here and listened to the discussion of this question, whether Senators realized that in parts of our country for many months—I might say for periods covering years—our common carriers were dog trains and pack animals. The first year I was in the Coeur d'Alene country much of the produce—and it was not trifling in amount—came in on dog trains; in the winter time on sledges pulled by dogs; in the summer time on dogs' backs on little pack saddles. They were carriers; that was interstate commerce. They came from Trout Creek, Belknap, and Thompsons Falls, in Montana, and other points over the line into Idaho, and they carried hundreds and hundreds of tons of the stuff we needed in that country. Was not that interstate commerce—mule trains, dog trains, pack trains, that carried probably as much freight across the State line as is in some sections carried upon the railroad trains? The whole settlement of California and Oregon and Nevada and Washington and Idaho was based upon interstate commerce through the medium of wagon and pack trains.

Mr. President, the income per mile of the railroads from passenger traffic is almost twice what it is from freight traffic. The income of the railroads of the United States from passenger traffic will approximate $5,500 per car per mile, and from freight about $3,000. We are treating this question as though it was one entirely pertaining to the hauling of coal, iron, and commodities of that kind. It is a broader question.

Mr. President, I wish to call attention to an amendment that is germane to the one I have just been discussing, which I have offered to this bill. After line 19, on page 3, I propose to strike out the words "on substantially similar circumstances and conditions."

The discussion of this amendment is one upon which I desire to have the attention of the Senate, and I realize that in the hour in which I am speaking the Members of the Senate are necessarily not all in the Chamber. I would prefer to defer the discussion of this particular legal question until I can have the attention of the Senate. I do not desire to inconvenience Senators who are at their luncheon or absent because of necessity. I make the suggestion at this time——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not desire to have that suggested.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Idaho is talking on an important matter in which the Senators are interested and upon which they have to vote, and he has a right to have them here to listen to him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich	Clapp	Hopkins	Perkins
Allee	Clark, Wyo.	Kean	Piles
Ankeny	Clay	Kittredge	Rayner
Bacon	Culberson	McCreary	Scott
Berry	Cullom	McCumber	Spooner
Beveridge	Daniel	Martin	Sutherland
Blackburn	Dillingham	Money	Tillman
Brandegee	Dubois	Morgan	Warner
Bulkeley	Foraker	Nelson	Wetmore
Burnham	Frye	Newlands
Burrows	Gallinger	Nixon

Mr. MORGAN. My colleague [Mr. PETTUS] is detained at home by sickness in his family, and is not able to attend the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I desire to discuss for a few minutes an amendment which I offered on the 9th of April, providing a method for obtaining information indispensable to the determination of what constitutes just compensation or a fair and reasonable rate. The bill as introduced and as reported by the Senator from South Carolina contains a provision in general terms under which such information may be obtained. I desire to call the Senate's attention to the amendment which I have offered, to be inserted on page 3, after section 1, which provides:

That for the purpose of enabling the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine the basis upon which to ascertain what rates shall be just and reasonable the said commission shall require any common carrier against whom complaint shall be made under the provisions of this act to file with said Commission, at its office in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, a copy of its articles of incorporation, together with any amendments or supplemental articles adopted by it, duly certified by the secretary of state or officer corresponding thereto of the State, Territory, district, insular possession, or foreign country wherein such corporation shall have been incorporated, and shall also file in like manner a copy of any and all by-laws of such corporation duly certified by the president or vice-president thereof, and under the seal thereof, attested by the secretary of the corporation.

That at the time of filing the articles of incorporation and by-laws of any corporation, as hereinbefore provided, and on or before June 30 in every succeeding year, the corporation so filing the same shall file with said Commission a statement verified by the oath of its president or vice-president, fully setting forth as follows:

First. The name of the corporation and the place and date of incorporation.

Second. The names, residence, and business or occupation of the officers of the corporation.

Third. The business in which the corporation is actually engaged, and in what States, Territories, districts, or insular possessions it is engaged in transacting such business.

Fourth. The cash value of the assets of the corporation and the nature and character of such assets.

Fifth. The amount of indebtedness of the corporation, and if such indebtedness is secured, in what manner.

Sixth. A statement in detail of all bonds and mortgages issued by and outstanding against said corporation, showing when said bonds were issued and when the same become due and the consideration received by the corporation for said bonds in property or money, and if in property, the nature and cash value of such property and where situated; and in case of mortgages, showing the date of such mortgages, the date of their maturity, the property covered thereby, and the cash value thereof.

Seventh. The amount of shares of stock or bonds owned or controlled by said corporation in any other corporation, and the proportion of the entire capital stock which such holding represents, both in the reporting corporation and the corporation whose shares it holds.

Eighth. The amount of assets and liabilities of any corporation in which such reporting corporation holds stock or bonds, giving the character of such assets and liabilities and of what such assets and liabilities consist.

Ninth. The number of shares of the capital stock of the corporation which have been actually issued, and the amount and value of the consideration actually received into the treasury of the corporation for such shares; where the payment was made in money, then the amount in money per share; where such payment was made in property, a description of such property as to location, character, and the cash value thereof.

Tenth. That no other stock of any character has been issued or is outstanding than that so reported.

Eleventh. That the corporation has issued no other bonds, mortgages, or other evidence of indebtedness than those stated in said report to have been issued.

Twelfth. The amount expended for extensions, construction, and improvements each year and where expended and the character thereof.

Thirteenth. The earning receipts from each branch of the business and from all sources, the operating and other expenses, balances of profit and loss, and a complete exhibit of the financial operations of the carrier each year, including an annual balance sheet. Such reports shall also contain information in relation to rates or regulations concerning freights or fares, or agreements or arrangements or contracts affecting the same, as the Commission may require—

That is in the bill as reported—

Such detailed report shall contain all the required statistics for a period of twelve months ending on the 30th day of June of each year, and shall be made under oath and filed with the Commission, at its office in Washington, on or before the 30th day of September, then next following, unless additional time may be granted in any case by the Commission; and if any carrier, person, or corporation subject to the provisions of this act shall fail to make and file such annual report within the time above specified or within the time extended by the Commission for making and filing the same, or shall fail to make specific answer to any question authorized by the provisions of this section within thirty days from the time it is lawfully required so to do, such parties shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each and every day it shall be in default in respect thereto.

Then it provides for monthly reports as in the existing bill. I will say that the additional features provided for by this amendment require the officers to state, under oath, as to the exact amount of property and indebtedness, and the earnings thereon. If we are going to invest the Interstate Commerce Commission with the power and the duty of determining what shall constitute fair and reasonable rates, we have got to know upon what that calculation is to be based. We must know the investment of the railroad company; we must know the cost of operating it; we must know its indebtedness; we must know whether or not its stock represented the actual value of the road, and what relation the bonded indebtedness bears to the value of the road. We ought to know what it has returned for taxation, but the habit has so grown up almost universally in the United States of taxing property without regard to its value that that perhaps would afford no criterion.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator whether he has examined any of the reports made by the railroads under existing law? My impression is that the reports now made by the railroads of the country engaged in interstate commerce give all the data called for by this amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say to the Senator that I have spent some days and a part of some nights in examining those reports for the purpose of informing my own mind as to whether or not there was occasion or necessity for this amendment. I did so both before and after its introduction. I find that those reports come up to a certain point and stop right there, and the point at which they stop is the point at which their usefulness would begin. I would refer to the reports as they are in the volume containing the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission for 1904, which is a very large volume, and they cover about three-fourths of the book. There is not enough valuable information upon which the Commission could act to cover ten pages, and I will undertake to say that the Commission were of that opinion, and that in determining the questions which they had before them they had slight and infrequent cause to refer to that report.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask the question for information; but my recollection is that the reports themselves made by the common carriers of the country are much fuller than the statistics given in the volume published by the Commission.

I will ask the Senator whether he has examined any of the reports of the leading companies? I have done so recently, and my recollection is, though I may be mistaken, that these reports cover fully all the data required here. I am entirely in sympathy with the purpose of the Senator in securing a basis for the action of the Commission, but it strikes me that so far as this statistical information is concerned, it is already within the reach of the Commission through these reports, and that what we require is in addition to that a physical valuation of all the property of the common carriers by experts under the direction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Such a valuation having been ascertained within a period of one or two years, it would be very easy thereafter to add every year the additions made to the plant or the property of the various carriers, and to deduct therefrom such amounts as should properly be deducted for depreciation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, one of the most marked instances in which the present manner of reporting is insufficient is in this, that it does not undertake to state the interest which one transportation company has in another. There is no more useful information to be furnished to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Right here I will state that in the reports which I have examined I have found statistics of that kind. For instance, in the original report of the Baltimore and Ohio or the Pennsylvania Railroad or the New York Central, which I have examined, I find detailed information given by those reports regarding the holdings of those corporations in other companies. For instance, it appears in the report of the Baltimore and Ohio road that that company owns about thirty million dollars' worth of securities in the Reading, which is engaged not only in transportation, but in working coal mines. Then, with reference to the New York Central, I recall the fact that the report of that company gives its stocks and bonds in a number of companies, not only transportation companies, but producing companies. I also found in the reports of some of the subsidiary companies of the New York Central system, such as the Michigan Southern Railroad, a statement of the corporate holdings of that road both in transportation companies and in producing companies.

So I ask the Senator whether he has rested simply upon the statistics which are given in this published report or whether he has gone back to the original sources of information, the reports themselves.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask the Senator if he refers to the documents that are on file in the pigeonholes of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have not gone to those documents, because under the law the Interstate Commerce Commission is required to publish these reports, and I have a right to assume that if they are not to be found in their annual publications they have no such reports. Now, I can not know, neither can any citizen of this country know, that the Interstate Commerce Commission in determining a controversy in which I may be interested, or may not, had that class of information except as we look at the observance of the law by that Commission.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will pardon me, I did not expect the Interstate Commerce Commission in considering a case affecting a particular road to send for the original report. I think that the Senator will find that those reports are remarkably full. If there is any defect in them of course I should be very glad to see the defect pointed out and remedied; but my impression is that the original reports are very full.

As to the publication in this volume, I imagine that the statistician of the Commission in discharging his duty does it with a view to a remedy, and that it would be almost impossible, or, at all events, a very great elaboration, to publish all the data contained in these reports.

I am sure the Senator has a very valuable suggestion here, but I will suggest to him that before proceeding further upon this amendment he look into the original reports and see whether or not they comply with the requirements of the amendment which he has prepared.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not so important at this time to look into the manner in which these reports are being made as it is to consider the sufficiency of the existing law, or the wisdom of the proposed law upon this question. Some of these requirements are contained in existing law and in proposed legislation, but not in all of them, and it is merely an endeavor to complete and fill out the requirements of the statute, so that if the companies have been voluntarily doing that which they were not required to do, and the doing of those things is helpful or necessary, let us make it a statutory provision.

Now, Mr. President, there have been some queer things incorporated into the interstate-commerce law. I suppose that we are at liberty in this age to criticise a Congress as a Congress in the abstract of fifteen or twenty years ago. We will have to do it.

I find, and we all find, in the statutes upon this question evidence of compromise, and we know that there has been some great force at work there, either to prevent the legislation or to shape it to suit the selfish purposes of somebody.

In the present interstate-commerce act in section 4 I find one of these provisos, and we can picture in our own mind how they come about. When a great amount of persuasion is brought to bear upon the members probably in the last hours of the session or in the hour of doubt as to whether they can enact a law they say, "Oh, well, all right, we will put in a proviso."

Now, listen to this one. After enacting a wise provision, one that would have accomplished practically all that the people wanted, they laid it upon the alter of sacrifice in the proviso in section 4:

Provided, however, That upon application to the Commission appointed under the provisions of this act such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the Commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property, and the Commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of this act.

The agitation for the enactment of the interstate-commerce law was based upon the very principles to which that exception applies. That was the subject of complaint, that the carriers were discriminating, showing favoritism, making preferred classes in cases and conditions. That was the cause of complaint. And yet after they had in the beginning of section 4 said that these carriers should not do the things complained of, for the sake of getting a bill through, a bill of some kind, of any kind, they inserted that proviso, which took the force and effect out of all of the enactment preceding it and allowed to be done the thing for which Congress in that hour was assembled to prevent. They had said in section 4:

That is shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance.

Now, that is where the law stood when the necessities of the occasion prompted them to accept the proviso I have just read, which took all the merit that was contained in the first part of section 4 out of it and left it equivalent to the declaration on the part of Congress that "we will turn you over to the mercy of the Interstate Commerce Commission without any bounds or limits or restrictions as to what you may be able to induce them to do."

That was the proposition in that statute. I have moved to strike out the words "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions" because they have been misused, misapplied; because the purpose the people expressed in the selection of a Congress to relieve them from their difficulties was defeated by it. The Supreme Court has taken that language as a Congressional license, authorizing them to do it, if in their judgment peculiar circumstances would not only justify but would enable them to do it. They were authorized to do it and it has been a question not of how strong the line may be drawn against unfairness by the carrier, but how it may be relaxed.

My amendment provides for the striking out of that clause. I desire to urge it at this time as a final declaration of principle upon that subject. The long and short haul clause is contained within that provision.

Then, on page 10, in line 17, because the words have been misused, because they have been made a medium of oppression, I desire to strike out the words "unjustly and unduly," because without those words the expression of the act exactly meets the requirements of justice. It says that they shall determine whether such rates are "unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory"—they should not be discriminatory at all to any degree—"or preferential." Why should a Commission have the right to discriminate or prefer one shipper against another?

Mr. President, I suggest that the provision which I have submitted to the Senate for the review of the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission is an absolute necessity; that if we send this legislation to the people without it they will condemn us and will say, "You have legislated for the other party. What have you done for us? You have spent weeks and months in construing the constitutional rights of the railroads. How much time have you spent in determining or considering the constitutional rights of property which the shipper or producer has, in the equal right with every other man, to the services of the common carrier?" That right is as much within the protection of the fifth amendment of the Constitution as is the right of the carrier to be compensated for services as carrier.

It has been proposed here—not for that purpose, perhaps I ought to say in fairness to those who have urged the proposition—that we shall in effect guarantee an income which is clothed in the terms "just and reasonable compensation;" that we shall guarantee an income to the transportation companies of the land. Has it been at any time proposed that we guarantee an income to the producer of the commodity whose servants these transportation companies are? He takes his chances under the law of contract.

I do not believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission is going to meet the expectation of the people in this matter. I do not believe that any department of the Government that has closed the doors, after a hearing, upon more than half of those who have applied for redress is going to meet the expectation of those in whose interest we are proposing to legislate, and I want in this hour to sound a word of warning, because it will come back to us.

This is not a party or a political question. It is one of political economics in which all the people are interested, one section of the country as much as another, from the humblest means of transportation to the palace car.

Does the present interstate-commerce law afford any relief to the people? And when I say "the people" I mean those who produce commodity and employ the common carrier. They are the people. The common carriers are a part of the people, but they are the servants of the people in that in consideration that they receive from the people the privileges and franchises under which they exercise their right as common carriers; they are given franchises of great value and the right to charge a reasonable compensation for their services, but the people who gave them that right retained the right to enjoy at their pleasure the services of these common carriers and the provisions for performing their services.

Mr. President, I do not know how much more consideration the Senate will give to the legal questions and refinements as to what we can or what we can not do. But I do know that in a great majority of the matters which come before us we do not have to approach closely either of those lines. There is a wide field for action by Congress in which it does not have to inquire minutely whether it may or may not do things. It is in this case a question of Will we do it? Does justice to the people demand that we shall create this body as an arbitrator and make ample provision for the submission of proper controversies to it, that they may create a record that shall speak the truth, and that that record, in the event of discontent by either party with the decision of the Commission, may be taken into the circuit court of the United States and there reviewed, both the law and the fact, but confined always to the record that was made before the Commission? It does not open the doors of the circuit court to a trial de novo, but leaves them to review it as they would the report of a master in chancery, and then the amendment provides that the order of the Commission shall only be stayed for the limited period of sixty days and that upon showing, except that the party asking for it can show that he has been diligent, can show a condition that will satisfy the mind of a chancellor that such order is necessary, and that the Supreme Court of the United States will not review any question except that of the rights of the parties under the Constitution appearing upon the record brought up from the circuit court—that makes a short review—and the amendment puts the order of the Commission into effect at once and does not wait thirty days after decision.

Mr. BACON. May I make an inquiry of the Senator?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. The question of this review, of course, is the vital question in this proposed legislation. For the purpose of thoroughly understanding the Senator, I wish to ask him whether he means the court shall have the same breadth of review as if we were now to organize two commissions—an inferior and a superior commission—and that the superior commission should have the entire review of the proceedings of the inferior commission. I wish to know what that review means. Does the Senator mean that in that sense the court shall, in this proposed law, have the review of the actions of the Commission?

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. BACON. I should be glad if the Senator would differentiate.

Mr. HEYBURN. The amendment, I think, is plain in regard to that matter. The amendment provides that the certified record of the proceedings of the Commission, accompanied by a notice to the parties of the intention to review such proceedings, shall be filed in the circuit court. There, at that point, for the first time the United States circuit court obtains jurisdiction of the controversy between the complainant and the party against whom the complaint was made before the Commission. For the purpose of enabling them to decide as between those parties they consider the record, which contains all the evidence and all the deductions made by the Commission from the evidence. In other words, if a party desires his case fully presented in the circuit court, he has only to see to it that his case is fully presented before the Commission; and he would not be heard in the circuit court to complain that there were other matters that might have been introduced before the Commission, because other portions of the statute than that to which this amendment is directed provide for a rehearing before the Commission. I did not think it necessary to incorporate that into this section, because it is already provided for in the bill. When he has had all the hearings before the Commission that will enable him fully to state his case, his case is made up, and it is presented for a determination of the law and the facts before the circuit court. It is provided by this amendment that in that determination that court may say whether or not the decision of the Commission as to what the rate regulation should be was right; and then, if it is right, the court will say so; and if it is not right, it will lay down a rule as to what constitutes the right, just as the courts do now in many instances, as I have before said, where we have delegated the power to executive branches of the Government, with authority to make rules and regulations in the enforcement of a law for the ascertainment of the facts to which the law must be applied. That is already the existing practice, and we do not need to amend our statutes in that regard. The amendment merely provides that these cases shall come within that rule of practice.

Of course the hearing before the circuit court of the United States would be a full hearing upon a printed record. The court would make its own rules in regard to printing and other details. We do not make those rules. The court would doubtless at a very early day establish a rule that the record in a case should be printed.

The amendment provides for the notice, how it shall be given, to whom it shall be given, and that, upon the filing of the record, the jurisdiction of the circuit court attaches. What more do we need? Then we give the court the power to review these questions. Then we say that, having reviewed them, it may enforce its judgment, as it may in any other case. There is no lack of power when Congress has spoken, whatever they might lack in the absence of Congressional action.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I am not making the inquiry for the purpose of in any manner entering into a controversy with the Senator, although I have a somewhat definite opinion myself, but I am really extremely anxious to know what is the exact position of Senators who favor what they call the "broad review." I want to get it so accurately defined that we may be able to see whether or not we agree with it or whether we differ from it. The Senator, in response to the inquiry which I made of him in pursuance of that desire on my part, answered in the negative; and yet, if I correctly understand him, what the Senator said, in explaining what he meant by the negative, is not consistent with the negative reply, though it may be I did not properly understand what the Senator said. The Senator is contending for the right of a full review by the courts, and, in order to ascertain what he meant by that, I asked this question: If, instead of one commission with the right of review by a court, this bill proposed to organize two commissions—an inferior commission, and a superior commission charged with the duty and power of reviewing in every particular and detail the acts of the inferior commission—and if there were, under such an arrangement, if there were such a provision by which the entire action of the inferior commission were to be reviewed by the superior commission, we would know what that meant.

Mr. HEYBURN. What would it mean?

Mr. BACON. It would mean that the superior commission would have the same supervision of a case decided by the inferior commission that the Supreme Court has in an equity cause that goes from a circuit court on appeal. There they have a full case before them, and there is no element of a decision of the circuit court that the Supreme Court has not the power to revise and correct. In the same way, if we were organizing two commissions—an inferior commission and a superior commission—the design being that there should be, in the sense I have indicated, an appeal from the inferior commission to the superior commission, when the case came before the superior commission that superior commission would have full jurisdiction for the consideration of every element that entered into the consideration and determination by the inferior commission and every conclusion of the inferior commission, and its determination would cover the field as fully and as perfectly as if it had originated with that superior commission.

Now, what I desire to know of the Senator is this: Under the contention made by him for a broad review, does the Senator contend for that review in the sense I have indicated, or, rather, with the power which that review would have in case we were to organize two commissions, the inferior and the superior? Does the Senator contend for a review by the courts as full and as ample as there would be in case two commissions were created and there was an appeal from one to the other of everything involved in the consideration of a matter by the first commission? Is that what the Senator contends for?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, that is quite a question.

Mr. BACON. I think it is the question, the vital question, in this case.

Mr. HEYBURN. If I may have the Senator's attention I will answer it.

Mr. BACON. I shall be very glad to give attention.

Mr. HEYBURN. In the first place, I will eliminate the term "broad review." This discussion has resulted in coining more phrases that have no meaning, except any meaning that you choose to put upon them, than any discussion I have ever heard. A broad review, as I would probably on first impulse state it, would be a review that opened the door to a reconsideration of the case without regard to what had transpired at any former hearing—a trial de novo. That would probably be the nearest approach to a definition of broad review. I do not favor this kind of review.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator say what would be a narrow review?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am going to. I have stated what a broad review is.

But first, as to the two commissions which the Senator has presented to us, I care not whether you call the first reviewing tribunal a second commission or a court; but having provided in my amendment that the reviewing authority shall be the United States circuit court, with the recognized and clearly defined powers and duties of that court, it is not necessary to define the manner in which it may deal with a question of which it has jurisdiction. I am not proposing any second reviewing board at all. It would be very interesting to me to know what might happen if such a second reviewing board were proposed; but not having proposed one, and having proposed that the decision of the original board shall be reviewed by a court of clearly defined powers and jurisdiction, it seems to me that I am relieved from a further consideration of what might happen if we provided for the second reviewing board. Now, I want to suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin——

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me, would a second reviewing board be any more judicial than the first?

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. BACON. Oh, Mr. President, Senators do not understand me. I was simply using that by way of illustration.

Mr. SPOONER. Illustrating what?

Mr. BACON. Illustrating the extent of the review on the part of the courts for which the Senator is contending. That was for the purpose of putting an illustration where there would be no doubt as to the breadth of review.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator think that it is within the constitutional capacity of Congress to limit or enlarge the judicial power in passing upon any right arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States?

Mr. BACON. I have very grave doubt about it, at least where jurisdiction of the subject-matter is given, and for that reason——

Mr. SPOONER. I did not think the Senator had any doubt about it.

Mr. BACON. Inasmuch as the Senator asked me a question, I hope he will permit me to answer it.

Mr. SPOONER. I will.

Mr. BACON. I have very grave doubt about it, certainly so far as concerns constitutional rights, and for that reason I have my interest very much excited to know what is the design, what is the desire, and what is the contemplation of those who insist upon the incorporation in this bill of a provision which shall give what they call, whether appropriately termed or not, the "broad review."

Mr. HEYBURN. But I did not——

Mr. BACON. So far as that goes, if the Senator is content with just such a review as the courts would have in the absence of any express provision in this bill, then no amendment is needed, because the bill as it came from the House is certainly in a position where the courts can take all the jurisdiction that they are entitled to exercise in a general way, outside of any express provision, and, according to the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin, with which I am very largely disposed to agree, that is a jurisdiction which exists outside of any express provision in this legislation. Therefore, it seems to me that whatever may be the power of Congress, we are rather engaged upon a superfluous act when we attempt to designate in this bill what shall be the jurisdiction. That is the conclusion, Mr. President, not only to which my mind is rapidly drifting, but is the direction in which it has tended all the time, and the conclusion which is becoming more and more definitely fixed in my mind. It is possible that developments in this discussion may show considerations leading to a different conclusion.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, will the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Georgia permit me?

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Idaho has the floor.

Mr. SPOONER. But it requires the consent of both.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Permit me to put a question to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Idaho has granted permission.

Mr. SPOONER. It requires the consent of each.

Mr. BACON. Very well; go ahead.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator from Georgia see any distinction or recognize any distinction between the power of the Federal courts in a suit brought under the fourteenth amendment to enjoin the enforcement of a rate fixed by a State under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution and the power of the court in passing upon a rate fixed by Congress under the fifth amendment to the Constitution?

Mr. BACON. Is that the question?

Mr. SPOONER. That is the question.

Mr. BACON. The Senator has wandered from the question.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. BACON. I beg pardon; the Senator has wandered from the question immediately under discussion and has rather ventured into the field where we are promised by the Senator a very exhaustive discussion of the question of the power of courts in granting injunctions.

Mr. SPOONER. No; not at all.

Mr. BACON. I am now on the question of the breadth of review.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, not at all.

Mr. BACON. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not discussing at all, or suggesting a discussion, as to the power of Congress to restrict, as is proposed here, the chancellor in the exercise of judicial power, but this is a thing which I frankly confess to my friend from Georgia, who is a great lawyer——

Mr. BACON. I thank the Senator very much. I fear the Senator overestimates.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator need not thank me. It is a fact; the Senator is responsible for that; not I. But this has troubled me: Where the State fixes a railway rate, either directly through legislative action or by a commission, and an original bill is filed in the circuit court of the United States to restrain the enforcement of that order upon the ground—and that is the only ground—that it violates the fourteenth amendment, I can very well see that the judicial power of the courts is more or less restricted, because the fourteenth amendment prohibits the States from passing any law which, among other things, shall take private property without due process of law, or deny the equal protection of the law. The court is to determine, as the court has often said, not whether the rate in that case is reasonable; not whether it is just compensation under the fifth amendment; but whether the rate is so low and so destructive of property rights as to constitute a taking of property without compensation as to be not due process of law.

What I wanted to attract the attention of the Senator to was this—and it has never been decided; it has never been presented to the courts of the United States, because Congress has never exercised the power until now—whether, where under an act of Congress a rate is fixed subject to the limitation of the fifth amendment, which provides two things, one of which is not provided for by the fourteenth amendment, first, that private property shall not be taken without just compensation and without due process of law, the scope of the review, the judicial power of the court, is not of necessity different in measure and scope from what it is under the fourteenth amendment?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think so far as the fifth amendment is concerned—I may be in error about that, but I think not—the court would have no right to enjoin a State commission——

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator does not understand me.

Mr. BACON. The Senator asked his question, and then discussed it at such length that I really do not know that I understand definitely his question. I wish the Senator would propound it again.

Mr. SPOONER. The question is whether the Senator from Georgia recognizes a distinction between the scope of the judicial power of the Federal court, when invoked by an original bill to restrain the enforcement under the fourteenth amendment of a rate fixed by the legislature of a State, and the scope of the jurisdiction of the Federal court when invoked to restrain the enforcement of a rate fixed under the fifth amendment by the Congress of the United States?

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, I do not think a State would have the right to violate the provision of the fourteenth amendment, nor do I think Congress would have the right to violate the fifth amendment. As to which is the greater obligation, that is another matter. I do not know how to draw the distinction between the two, except that it is one of degree.

Mr. HEYBURN. I only desire to say that the discussion between the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has wandered somewhat from the point that I desire to answer.

Mr. SPOONER. I understand that was just the distinction which the Senator from Idaho drew.

Mr. HEYBURN. I wanted to answer the question of the Senator from Wisconsin and then let its application follow. The question remains unanswered.

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator allow me to put in a question?

Mr. HEYBURN. I would gladly yield to the Senator, but I desire to answer this question.

Mr. FULTON. You can answer the one I wish to propose at the same time.

Mr. HEYBURN. Sometimes it may be convenient to bunch questions in that way, but it is not always so. The Senator from Wisconsin asked me a question. He asked me with reference to a broad or a narrow review and as to what my amendment provided. I would call his attention to the provision in this amendment for a review, and you can call it either a broad or a narrow review as may seem best to you. The jurisdiction of the circuit court being attached, the amendment provides:

> The jurisdiction of said circuit court shall fully attach for the purpose of determining all questions of law and fact presented by said record, and the court is empowered and authorized upon such review in the event that it shall find upon the record that the rate complained of is either unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, preferential, or prejudicial, or that the charge or practice complained of is unjust or unreasonable, to fix and determine such a rate or practice as in its judgment shall be just, reasonable, and not discriminatory, preferential, or prejudicial.

They must do it upon the record which comes from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the court, and I direct the attention of the Senator from Georgia to this part of my reply. The court being a judicial tribunal is presumed rightly to be best able to apply the legal principles by which what is right and just and reasonable are to be determined as to those facts, and that is the object and purpose of the review; and in that it is not a second board, but a judicial tribunal.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. The amendment of the Senator is for the purpose of directing the attention of the Commission and the court to anything which is "unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, preferential, or prejudicial." Now, I should like, by way of illustration, if the Senator would point out, assuming that the Commission has made an award, or rather fixed a rate——

Mr. SPOONER. That is not an award.

Mr. BACON. I corrected myself, and I said "fixed a rate," that is complained of. Now, I desire the Senator to point out, if he can, what particular act of the Commission in fixing that rate would or would not be reviewable by the court under his amendment, or rather, I would say, would not be reviewable by the court under his amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Every one of those questions might, or only one of them might, be involved in the review.

Mr. BACON. Very well, but——

Mr. HEYBURN. That would depend upon the facts of the particular case.

Mr. BACON. Now, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. HEYBURN. The law being applicable to the facts which may arise in each case, the court would only apply them so far as they would be applicable.

Mr. BACON. I understand the Senator to say that, under the review given the court, the court would have the right to review and reverse any judgment by the Commission, if we may call it a "judgment," or any order by the Commission which was either "unjust or unreasonable or discriminatory or preferential or prejudicial."

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BACON. That is pretty broad.

Mr. HEYBURN. Any one of them.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, those are the things which the Senator suggests under his amendment shall be reviewable. Will the Senator now suggest any act by the Commission in the making of this order, which, under the above language of his amendment, the Senator does not think would be reviewable? Can he suggest any single act of the Commission which, under the words of his amendment, he does not think would be reviewable under his amendment?

Mr. HEYBURN. Does the Senator mean any act enumerated here, or any act at all?

Mr. BACON. Any act at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. We are legislating within the restrictions of the legislation proposed. It is not necessary to go outside——

Mr. BACON. I wish to put a question to the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will pardon me, I want to answer the question which has been propounded. I am not going to be led outside of the limits of the subject-matter of the legislation existing and proposed.

There may be a hundred things that may be done that might or might not be reviewable, but this amendment enumerates the things that are reviewable, and the present statute enumerates the same things that are reviewable. So I do not think the question that the Senator asks is, in all friendliness, a fair question at all, because I am not proposing by this amendment that the court shall review any other questions than those enumerated. I have not gone beyond the enumeration of the existing statute nor of any proposed amendment.

Mr. BACON rose.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator let me vary the question, as I was not fortunate in so phrasing it before as to meet the Senator's approbation? Will the Senator suggest any act of the Commission in making any order fixing any rate which would not fall within one of these designations, if there was fault found with it that it was either "unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, preferential, or prejudicial?"

Now, if the Senator will pardon me, in order that I may make myself clearly understood——

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to answer the question.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator objects to my propounding an inquiry I will not intrude upon him.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I merely wanted to answer the question that had been asked.

Mr. BACON. But I want to ask another question.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not want the Senator to ask a question and answer it himself.

Mr. BACON. I was not proceeding to do so; but if the Senator objects, I will not intrude further upon him.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have not the slightest objection to a question. The Senator asked me whether or not I could think of any other subject than those enumerated. Perhaps I could, but it is immaterial whether I could or not. Those enumerated are the recognized questions necessary to be covered by the legislation. The question of whether or not a rate is unjust is certainly one that can be readily conceived of under many circumstances. It would be unjust to charge one man more than another. The word "unjust" probably comprehends every other word in that category, and those other definitions and distinctions are there because they are unjust. The word "unreasonable" is broad enough to cover every one of them, because that is an unreasonable rate which is an unjust rate or a discriminatory or a preferential rate. The words "discriminatory" and "preferential" are in classes of themselves and have a distinct meaning that is recognized both in and out of the courts.

It depends upon the testimony. For instance, take some of the decisions that have already been rendered, or imagine a case. It is a discriminatory act if you permit me to have a rebate, secret or otherwise, because it discriminates in your favor as a carrier and against me as a shipper; it is discriminatory if you refuse to furnish another man cars and furnish them to me. That is a discrimination. It is not difficult for a court, in reviewing the act of a commission, to say whether or not, under the facts that are in the record, those offenses have been committed. It is the natural function of the court to do that; it is what the court does every day in other matters of business and life—to say whether or not that is the case.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FULTON. I should like to call the Senator's attention back to the suggestion made by the Senator from Wisconsin a moment ago, if he does not object to it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not object at all.

Mr. FULTON. I should like to hear the Senator on the proposition suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin a moment ago. The question suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin was whether or not there is any difference in the power to be exercised by the court, if I understood him, in entertaining a suit brought to restrain the putting in force of a schedule of rates made under a statute enacted by a State legislature—the Federal court, of course, exercising its power solely under the fourteenth amendment, which prohibits the taking of private property without due process of law, and a suit brought to restrain a rate pursuant to an act of Congress, under the fifth amendment, where property is prohibited from being taken without just compensation. I want to ask the Senator if the question as to what constitutes taking of property is not involved in either and equally in both classes of cases?

Mr. HEYBURN. It necessarily is.

Mr. FULTON. What constitutes, then, a taking of private property without due process of law must be the same as what constitutes a taking without just compensation up to the point of compensation. Therefore if the Supreme Court——

Mr. SPOONER rose.

Mr. FULTON. Just a second. If the Supreme Court, under the fourteenth amendment, shall define what constitutes a taking, that would necessarily be the same definition, would it not, that the court would say would apply, if the question of want of just compensation were also involved? That is the proposition.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not controverting at all the line of thought of the Senator from Idaho. On the contrary, he is speaking of a distinction which seems to me to exist.

Almost every State constitution provides that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. Suppose the legislature of a State passes a law providing for a railroad commission, and gives to that commission the power to fix rates, and confers upon the courts of the State the power to review, as is done in my State and many other States, the question whether the rate fixed by the commission is or is not a just compensation within the meaning of the constitution of the State; what question does that present to the courts of the State? Simply the question whether the taking is without due process of law, because the rate is so low as to destroy the value of the use of the property?

Mr. FULTON. Let me ask the Senator, Would it not be, in that case, what constituted the taking of property?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; but it would not be what constitutes the taking of private property without just compensation. Now, would not in that case the court of the State be authorized and required to consider the question upon the proof at the trial whether the compensation was or was not a just compensation? That is what courts are for—to protect from invasion the rights secured by constitutional provisions.

If the Senator will permit me, when you come to the fourteenth amendment it has seemed to me—and I am troubled about it—that the question presented to the courts of the United States on an original bill to restrain the enforcement of a rate fixed by a State, on the ground that it violated the fourteenth amendment, was different. The fourteenth amendment says nothing about the taking of private property without just compensation. It provides that private property shall not be taken without due process of law; and the courts of the United States, therefore, have held themselves limited to inquiring and deciding not whether any rate fixed was just compensation, for the courts of the United States are not carrying into operation the constitution of the State or the laws of the State. Their only ground of interference is the alleged violation of the fourteenth amendment, and they therefore consider whether the rate fixed is so low as to constitute, because of the utter absence of just compensation, a taking without due process of law.

I now come to the fifth amendment to the Constitution, which puts the legislation of Congress on precisely the same basis that the legislation of the State is put on under the constitution of the State.

Mr. FULTON rose.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to add this question: Whether the question as to the validity of a rate fixed by Congress, or the compensation, in other words, fixed by the Commission under an act of Congress, which is subject to the limitations of the fifth amendment, is not precisely the same as the question which the State court is obliged to consider under the State constitution embodying the same language—that is, whether the rate is or is not just. That is what I want to present to the Senator.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Idaho will pardon me for a moment, in order that my meaning may be plain, in a review by a court of the acts of the Commission with these proposed powers, the court is not limited to the question of the value of the property or what may represent property, because the powers conferred upon the Commission go beyond the mere matter of fixing rates and include regulations and practices; and when it comes to that it is a very different thing. One is under explicit constitutional protection, while the other may not be. It is a very different question from that suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin or the Senator from Idaho; at least it is not covered, as I understand, by anything they have so far said.

I had that distinction in mind when I was endeavoring to get from the Senator from Idaho a definition of what he meant by "the review of the court." I was not limiting my suggestion to the contemplation simply of a review of the matter of the rate; and if I understood the Senator from Idaho correctly, it would embrace every regulation and every practice prescribed by the Commission if the court is to have an unlimited review.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I value the opinion of the Senator from Georgia, and I want to ask him this question, if he will allow it.

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Whether, in his mind, there is not a distinction, and a clear distinction, between the due process of law under the fourteenth amendment and the just compensation under the fifth amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin, although I do not want to interrupt the colloquy between him and the Senator from Georgia, that the fourteenth amendment has not application at all outside of the States. It is intended only to control the States, and its language has been construed so often that I do not see how it can possibly affect the consideration of this question. It is an interesting subject, but the language of the clause of the construction placed on it takes it out of the consideration of this question entirely. It says:

> Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.

There is no more of the element of the fifth amendment in that than there is in the Pentateuch.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. That had occurred to me, and was the keynote, as I understood, of the Senator's amendment and the Senator's argument.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am sorry the Senator so understood it, because it is not based upon that to any extent——

Mr. SPOONER. No——

Mr. HEYBURN. Or in any manner whatever.

Mr. SPOONER. We are not proceeding here under the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Not at all.

Mr. SPOONER. I know that.

Mr. HEYBURN. It has no application to the question under consideration.

Mr. SPOONER. I understand, but we are proceeding under the fifth amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was intended as a limitation upon the States. It has nothing whatever to do with a question of this kind. If there is a limitation of our power, or a direction of the manner of its exercise, it is in the fifth amendment of the Constitution, and that amendment does have to be considered, but not to the extent of controlling our deliberations here. There is ample power for us to legislate upon this question and to pass it by without disrespect to it or disregarding its injunction. The fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States was intended to protect individual property against the taking by any kind of government, by any process, except in the manner to be exercised under the amendment.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FULTON. If it will not annoy the Senator from Idaho I should like to explain briefly the idea I had in propounding to the Senator from Wisconsin the question I did.

Mr. HEYBURN. It will not disturb me.

Mr. FULTON. It seems to me that under the fourteenth amendment, which prohibits the taking of private property without due process of law, and under the fifth amendment, which prohibits the taking of private property for public use without just compensation, the rules of construction in the two cases must run parallel up to the point and until it has been determined what constitutes a taking. Under the fourteenth amendment the Supreme Court has time and again said that a rate fixed by a State commission which precludes the carrier from realizing a sufficient income to meet his expense and pay a fair return on his investment or on the value of his property, is a taking without due process of law. Now, do they not, in passing on that, virtually determine what would also be a just compensation?

Mr. HEYBURN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the language is exactly the same in both the fifth and the fourteenth amendments in regard to that question. The fifth amendment is larger in its application and wider than the fourteenth. Let me call the Senator's attention to the distinction in the language. The fifth amendment says:

> Nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

That is the fifth amendment. All there is in the fourteenth amendment is a repetition of a part of that amendment:

> Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

It did not need the repetition of that in the fourteenth amendment at all except as a limitation on the State. It was already in the fifth amendment as a national principle.

So, as I said a few moments ago, we do not consider the fourteenth amendment at all in disposing of this question. Every principle that is stated in it that might be applicable or useful was already contained in the fifth amendment to the Constitution.

As I have endeavored to show, the rights of the two parties here are the same. If we can not take the property of the carrier we certainly can not take the property right of the owner of the commodity, because his right to participate in the services of the common carrier is just as much property as the right of the carrier to compensation for its services; and to pass him by, as he seems to have been passed by for the last twenty years or thereabouts, it seems to me is doing less than our duty, if it is not an open and violent disregard of, and an outrage upon, the rights of the very party in whose interest we are assuming to act and whose interests we would be overlooking entirely.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to ask the Senator from Idaho a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. It may be that while I was out of the Chamber the Senator from Idaho has touched upon the question to which I wish to invite his attention in reference to his amendment, but nevertheless I direct his attention to its language, on page 3:

> And the court is empowered and authorized upon such review, in the event that it shall find upon the record that the rate complained of is either unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, preferential, or prejudicial, or that the charge or practice complained of is unjust or unreasonable, to fix and determine such a rate or practice as in its judgment shall be just, reasonable.

The Senator seems by that clause of the amendment to intend to confer the rate-making power on the circuit courts of the United States, authorizing them to fix a rate which will operate in the future. But it seemed to me that if there was any quesion settled by the Supreme Court of the United States it was that the courts had no such power and could not be clothed with such power; and I invite the attention of the Senator to a paragraph in the Reagan case (154 U. S., p. 400):

As we have seen, it is not the function of the courts to establish a schedule of rates. It is not, therefore, within our power to prepare a new schedule or rearrange this. Our inquiry is limited to the effect of the tariff as a whole, including therein the rates prescribed for all the several classes of goods, and the decree must either condemn or sustain this act of quasi legislation. If a law be adjudged invalid, the court may not in the decree attempt to enact a law upon the same subject which shall be obnoxious to no legal objections. It stops with simply passing its judgment on the validity of the act before it. The same rule obtains in a case like this.

I call the attention of the Senator, repeating somewhat what I have said, that if there is any question which seems to be settled by the Supreme Court of the United States it is that the courts will not exercise the power to fix a rate which shall be operative in the future. Notwithstanding, it seems that the Senator's amendment is intended to incorporate such a provision in the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. The court in the case to which the Senator refers and in the case upon which their decision in that particular case is based stated that Congress had not given them the power which they decline to assume. They are there interpreting the law that we are proposing to amend. The question is not whether that law is or is not right. The question is whether we will change that law and give the court this power. It is a very different proposition. The court said in another case in which that decision is used that Congress has not given the court the power to do more than to review the decision and say whether it was right; that it has not given the courts the power to say what shall be a lawful rate, inferring that when Congress shall see fit to give it the power it would exercise it. That is the difference between those cases.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate by making a speech. I desire, however, to ask the Senator from Idaho or any other Senator who is willing to answer a question.

It seems to me that the principal matter of controversy just now is as to the court review; just what it is; how broad it shall be, or how limited. I should like to have some Senator tell me what is the difference between the Bailey amendment and the Long amendment, save and except the fact that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] in his amendment provides that there shall be no interlocutory injunction. Are not those two amendments practically the same, and is not the Senator's [Mr. HEYBURN] amendment practically the same, so far as the court review is concerned? Would not the same end be accomplished by either one of those amendments, looking simply to the question of court review, if adopted?

It seems to me the court review must be what the party complaining makes it. He may complain of everything the Commission has done; he may complain of only one thing the Commission has done, whether the complainant is the carrier or the shipper, and I think the shipper should be allowed to make complaint as well as the carrier. I would like to have the Senator from Idaho answer it, if he has given it sufficient thought.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have considered the question, and I have a note before me which I had intended to take up, comparing the different provisions in the different amendments and in the original bill, and I had made some analysis of them, but I had so long overrun the time I intended to occupy that I omitted to do so.

I will make this suggestion in reference to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. It provides:

Any carrier, or person, or corporation, party to such complaint, and dissatisfied with the rate—

That would cover both parties.

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes—

or charge, regulation or practice so established and prescribed, may file a bill against the Commission in any circuit court of the United States for the district in which any portion of the line of the carrier or carriers may be located, alleging that such rate or charge will not afford a just compensation for the service or services to be performed, or that the regulation or practice is unjust and unreasonable.

The first part of that could not possibly contemplate the right of the complainant, because he is not asking for just compensation.

Mr. TELLER. No.

Mr. HEYBURN (reading)—

For the service or services to be performed, or that the regulation or practice is unjust or unreasonable—

If he came in at all it would be under the second clause—

Or that the regulation or practice is unjust and unreasonable; and if upon the hearing the court shall find that such rate or charge will not afford a just compensation—

That can not refer to the shipper—

for the service or services to be performed, or that the regulation or practice is unjust and unreasonable—

Those regulations and practices of course all emanate from the carrier; they are not the practices of the shipper—it shall enjoin the enforcement of the same.

The very fact that it enjoins the enforcement of the order that is made against the railroad company cuts out any possible interpretation that the amendment is intended to give the right to the complaining party to have it reviewed. It shows that that portion of the amendment was not intended to include the complainant at all, because all its provisions are directed to the relief that may or may not be granted to the carrier. Then this statement says:

This amendment so far would seem to provide for a review upon the question as to whether or not such rate or charge will afford just compensation for the service or services to be performed, or whether the regulation or practice is unjust or unreasonable, for it is only in the event of the court so finding that it is authorized to enjoin the enforcement of the order. And this would not include the consideration by the court of the rights of the complaining party, the shipper or producer, because such shipper or producer does not render services to be performed, and the question of just compensation can only apply to such services.

Mr. TELLER. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. HEYBURN. From the notes I had made.

Mr. TELLER. Go on.

Mr. HEYBURN. I say:

The proviso of the Bailey amendment relates to the practice in regard to suspending orders and precludes clearly suspension of any rate charge, regulation, or practice prescribed by the Commission by any preliminary or interlocutory decree or order by the court. The right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States clearly is limited to the carrier and the Commission.

In its provision for appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States it is not broad enough to permit the complainant to take advantage of it.

Now, I have similar notes with respect to all the amendments and all of the provisions contained in the amendment regulating the appeal, and I only left them out of my talk to-day because of the time I have already occupied. I also have the Long amendment annotated in the same way.

Mr. TELLER. As I said, I do not desire to go on and discuss this question now, but it seems to me we have discussed it long enough now to get to some positive provision as to what the review shall be. I have not been able to learn from any speaker exactly what he was satisfied to have reviewed. I understand, of course, that all these questions could be complained of by the carrier; that it could complain of any improper regulation just as well as it could that a rate was confiscatory, if the regulation invaded its right. Whatever is at issue must be what is complained of. If he complains of all the things, they are all at issue. If he complains of one of them, that is the only one in issue.

Of course, this is an irregular kind of a proceeding, by petition. I presume the court will hold eventually that this proceeding, although called a petition, must conform to the equity practice. A man comes in by petition, and he has to state in his petition what his grievance is. And when he comes to trial, he will be limited to what he has alleged in his petition. He will not be allowed to enter the whole field unless he has complained of the whole. That is my notion about it.

Under the bill as it came from the House there are two things the Commission may do. It may first determine that the rate fixed by the railroad company is unfair and unjust and improper. And then it may fix one that it says is just and proper. There are two issues to be made there by the railroad company. In the first place, they can say when they get into court, "The rate established by the company is a just and proper one." Secondly, they may say the rate fixed by the Commission is not just and proper. You have two questions. One, of course, is a negative of the other. Will anyone contend that the court may determine that the rate fixed by the railroad is not fair, and stop there? Will not the railroad company be accorded an opportunity to prove that the rate fixed by the Commission is unfair? For, you may say what you are a mind to about it, this fixes rates. Is the court limited to saying that the rate fixed by the Commission is confiscatory? Not at all, in my judgment.

I have made these suggestions, and I hope somebody who has given thought to the question how extensive the review will be will give it attention. So far as I am concerned, I believe that whatever the railroad company or the shipper, if he is allowed to come in, as he should be, complains of should be a matter for the consideration of the court.

Mr. LODGE. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment presented by the Senator from Massachusetts will be printed and lie on the table.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 15331) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments may be considered as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, that course will be pursued.

Mr. CLAPP. I call the attention of Senators present to the fact that at the back of the bill there is an index and that the report is also indexed. The clerk of the committee prepared these, and they will be convenient to Senators in referring to the bill or the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed to read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, under the subhead "President," on page 2, after line 13, to strike out:

That no part of the moneys herein appropriated for fulfilling treaty stipulations shall be available or expended unless expended without regard to the attendance of any beneficiary at any school other than a Government school.

And to insert:

Mission schools on an Indian reservation may, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, receive for such Indian children duly enrolled therein the rations of food and clothing to which said children would be entitled under treaty stipulations if such children were living with their parents.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment go over.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the amendment be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will go over.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 23, to insert:

That upon the petition of any Indian allottee to whom a trust or other patent containing restrictions upon alienation has been or shall be issued under any law or treaty the President may in his discretion continue such restrictions on alienation for such period as he may deem best.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Secretary," on page 3, line 20, before the word "in," to strike out "purchase" and insert "purchases;" so as to read:

That as far as practicable Indian labor shall be employed and purchases in the open market made from Indians, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 5, after the word "reported," to insert "to Congress with the reason therefor;" and in line 6, after the word "detail," to strike out "and the reason therefor, to Congress;" so as to read:

That any diversions which shall be made under authority of this section shall be reported to Congress with the reason therefor in detail at the session of Congress next succeeding such diversion.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 2, to insert:

That the homestead settlers on all ceded Indian reservations in Minnesota who purchased the lands occupied by them as homesteads be, and they hereby are, granted an extension of one year's time in which to make the payments now provided by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 7, to strike out:

That when not required for the purpose for which appropriated, the funds herein provided for the pay of specified employees at any agency may be used by the Secretary of the Interior for the pay of other employees at such agency; but no deficiency shall be thereby created; and, when necessary, specified employees may be detailed for other service when not required for the duty for which they were engaged; and that the several appropriations herein or heretofore made for millers, blacksmiths, engineers, carpenters, physicians, and other persons, and for various articles provided for by treaty stipulation for the several Indian tribes, may be diverted to other uses for the benefit of said tribes, respectively, within the discretion of the President, and with the consent of said tribes, expressed in the usual manner; and that he cause report to be made to Congress, at its next session thereafter, of his action under this provision.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 14, to insert:

That the act entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes," approved February 8, 1887, be, and is hereby, amended by adding the following:

"No lands acquired under the provisions of this act shall, in any event, become liable to the satisfaction of any debt contracted prior to the issuing of the final patent in fee therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 7, to insert:

That where, under existing laws, timber has been cut from the allotment of any Indian under contract approved by the Interior Department the Secretary be, and he hereby is, directed to immediately cause to be paid to said allottees, or their heirs, all moneys on deposit to their credit and all sums due the said allottees from the timber so cut, said payments to be made to the parties in interest or their next of kin or guardian upon his personal check drawn upon said funds: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to investigate and report to Congress whether the Indians upon reservations having timber, and Indians owning allotments with timber, may not themselves, under the supervision and instruction of competent men to be appointed for that purpose from the Interior Department, cut and manufacture said timber to the end that they may receive a price more nearly commensurate with the value of said timber, and at the same time may become familiar with the business of manufacturing lumber.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 18, to insert:

That when the land of deceased allottees has been sold under existing laws, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to immediately cause to be paid to the heirs of said deceased allottees any and all moneys on deposit due said heirs from the sale of said land of said deceased persons, and that he be further directed to cause to be paid immediately upon collection, all moneys due Indian allottees or their heirs as the proceeds of leases upon individual allotments: Provided, That no money accruing from any lease or sale of lands held in trust by the United States for any Indian shall become liable to be subjected to the payment of any debt of, or claim against, such Indian contracted or arising during such trust period, or, in case of a minor, during his minority, except with the approval and consent of the Secretary of the Interior, who is hereby vested with full power and authority to do and perform all things necessary hereunder.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 17, before the words "per centum," to strike out "three" and insert "four;" so as to read:

That the shares of money due minor Indians as their proportion of the proceeds from the sale of ceded or tribal Indian lands, whenever such shares have been, or shall hereafter be, withheld from their parents, legal guardians, or others, and retained in the United States Treasury by direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall draw interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, unless otherwise provided for, etc.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will venture to ask the chairman of the committee why that amendment has been made? We are pretty fortunate nowadays if we get 3 per cent on safe investments in ordinary business. I should like to know why we should pay more to these Indians than the House thought was a fair interest. The Senator from Minnesota doubtless can give me the desired information.

Mr. CLAPP. There is another provision somewhere, I think, that also provides for 4 per cent, and the Department thought it was better to have the same rate of interest drawn in both cases. Personally I myself think 3 per cent would be a sufficient interest.

Mr. GALLINGER. While we look up the other provision, I will ask that the amendment may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over for the present.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 24, to insert:

That as to any Indian lands allotted under any law or treaty without the power of alienation and within a reclamation project approved by the Secretary of the Interior, all restriction as to alienation as to any such allottee is hereby removed subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to the end that such allottee may alienate so much of his allotment as may not be necessary for him, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, to retain, and to the end that such allottee may enter into the necessary agreement as to the portion of his allotment to be retained; provided for in the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stats., p. 389).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 12, to strike out:

That any Indian allotted lands under any law or treaty without the power of alienation, and within a reclamation project approved by the Secretary of the Interior, may sell and convey any part thereof, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, but such conveyance shall be subject to his approval, and when so approved shall convey full title to the purchaser the same as if final patent without restrictions had been issued to the allottee: Provided, That the consideration shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States, and used by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to pay the construction charges that may be assessed against the unsold part of the allotment, and to pay the maintenance charges thereon during the trust period, and any surplus shall be a benefit running with the water right to be paid to the holder thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Commissioner," on page 12, line 5, after the word "service," to strike out "and that so much of the acts of March 2, 1892, and April 21, 1904, which require the Commissioner to report annually the names of all employees in the Indian Service is hereby also repealed;" so as to make the clause read:

That so much of the section 3 of the act of August 15, 1876, as required the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to embody in his annual report a detailed and tabular statement of all bids and proposals received for any services, supplies, and annuity goods for the Indian service, together with a detailed statement of all awards of contracts made for any such services, supplies, and annuity goods for which said bids or proposals were received, is hereby repealed, and hereafter he shall embody in his annual report only a detailed statement of the awards of contracts made for any services, supplies, and annuity goods for the Indian service.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill why that amendment is made. I do not quite understand the purpose of the amendment. Will the Senator explain it? As I understand it, and I think that is right, if those words are stricken out the Commissioner is required to certify the employment. Am I correct, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. CLAPP. Well, not in detail. It was thought that that was an expense and labor hardly necessary, and so the committee struck it out.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 13, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" and in line 13, after the word "dollars," to insert "$10,000 of which to be used exclusively in the Indian Territory;" so as to make the clause read:

To enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to take action to suppress the traffic of intoxicating liquors among Indians, $20,000, $10,000 of which to be used exclusively in the Indian Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 17, before the word "thousand," to insert "and sixty;" so as to make the clause read:

For support of Indian day and industrial schools, and for other educational purposes not hereinafter provided for, $1,360,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 21, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "ninety-three;" so as to make the clause read:

For construction, purchase, lease, and repair of school buildings, and sewerage, water supply, and lighting plants, and purchase of school sites, and improvement of buildings and grounds, $493,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 23, making the total appropriation for "General provisions" in connection with the Office of Indian Affairs $1,793,000, in lieu of $1,715,000.

Mr. LODGE. As we have amended the preceding items, the total is $1,853,000, as I figure it, and it ought to read that way.

Mr. CLAPP. The committee will accept the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DUBOIS. There is obviously a mistake there, and I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to it. There is an appropriation of $18,000 which the committee made, and it should go in there. My attention was just called to it.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly as it stands it does not correspond to the figures. This total covers $1,360,000——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Assistant Secretary stated that it covers the item of $20,000 in line 13.

Mr. LODGE. Does it cover the $20,000 also? Then $20,000 in the first paragraph, $1,360,000 in the second, $493,000, make $1,873,000. There can not be any question about the figures.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask that the item may go over. There is an item for $18,000 which the committee agreed to and which should be there.

Mr. LODGE. That would make the total more erroneous than it is now. Does not the Senator see that it is over a hundred thousand dollars short?

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to amend it so that it will be correct.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin moves the following amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to correct the total in lines 23 and 24 so as to read:

In all, $1,873,000.

Mr. LODGE. Now, I should like to ask the Secretary, who added $20,000 to my original figures, if that is not a separate appropriation not included in the total? There is a period at the end of that paragraph.

Mr. CLAPP. I think the Senator is right.

Mr. LODGE. That is a separate and isolated appropriation. Therefore I suggest that we amend lines 23 and 24 so as to read:

One million eight hundred and fifty-three thousand dollars.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 8, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That not exceeding $5,000 of this amount may be used under direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in the transportation and placing of Indian pupils in positions where remunerative employment can be found for them in industrial pursuits. The provisions of this section shall apply to native pupils brought from Alaska.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I suppose I hardly should take advantage at this time of an objection to that amendment, but I was not in the committee at the time it was adopted. I simply want to enter now my protest against that provision or any similar provision. It is simply a provision to authorize the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to find places of employment for Indian girls and boys—mostly, I understand, girls—from those schools. My own opinion is that no good whatever has come of taking these girls away from the schools and sending them out into private employment, and I do not think that any sum of money should be used for that purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as I heard the proposed amendment read it struck me as being a very wise provision, and I certainly shall give it my hearty support, unless the Senator from North Dakota can present some facts showing that no good has come from an effort along these lines.

I know it is frequently said that when the young Indian boys whom we educate at Carlisle and Hampton go to their homes after getting their education they go back to a very considerable extent to their former lives and habits; but I think that has been overstated. I have made some investigation along that line, and I think very great good has come from the education of the Indian youth in those schools and in schools of that character.

It does seem to me that we may very well expend this small sum of $5,000 in finding homes for these Indian girls or boys and giving them an opportunity to become more useful than they otherwise would become. I will ask the Senator from North Dakota if he knows as a matter of fact that failure has attended efforts along this line. I myself have no knowledge of it whatever.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, to determine whether failure has followed one would have to consider whether success has followed in any case. I do not know of a single case of success. I do know of a number of cases where girls have been taken out of the school and, instead of being sent home, have been sent out to private employment, getting practically nothing for the time that they were employed as domestic servants. I have known of their writing letters, innumerable letters, home, begging and praying for some one to take them away from their place of employment, and having been placed out by a school they are practically there often against their own will. They do not know where to go; they have no way of getting away. If they are put into the employment of people who simply wanted to make hired help out of them, they have no way of escaping from it like a white person. It may be the case of an Indian girl from my State working for a private family in the State of New Jersey, and I have known one or two instances where they have often threatened to commit suicide if they were not released from their thraldom.

My position in this matter I may as well state now. I do not believe there is any use or anything to be gained in trying to make a white person out of an Indian, whether it is an Indian girl or an Indian boy. I do believe that the Indian girl is doing more for the civilization of the Indians, if we are doing anything at all for their civilization, than all of the schooling of the Indian girls and boys. They are taught to cook, they are taught to be housekeepers, they are taught to take a little pride in their home, and that really to me is the foundation of all progress; and when they go home to their reservations and marry in their reservations they do considerable toward keeping up a pleasant and agreeable home.

I think the salvation of the Indian would lie in the Indian girl, so far as civilization is concerned. I must say, though, I do not think there is much hope even for that. But I do not believe it is good for an Indian girl to take her away from one of her kind, where for two or three or four months she never sees another Indian girl or anyone with whom she can associate. It is a species of imprisonment that produces, in my opinion, no good results whatever.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have very great regard for the opinion on a matter of this kind of the Senator from North Dakota, who lives in a State where Indians in considerable numbers are to be found. But there is one point I wish to emphasize. The instances the Senator cites are of Indian boys and girls, particularly girls, who have been put out to service directly from the schools. It will be observed that in this amendment they are to be under the direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I take it that that official, who is a very competent man, will inquire into all the circumstances of the case and not place these young Indian girls or boys in positions that they do not wish to occupy. I think there is that difference, which we ought to keep in mind.

It does seem to me, I will repeat, that it will be good legislation for us to appropriate this very small amount to make this experiment, because I take it that it is experimental at best.

Mr McCUMBER. I will simply say that it would be impossible for the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or anyone situated here in this city to look after the employment of the few individuals who would receive employment under this provision. For myself I am free to say that I think no good whatever has ever come of taking any persons away from their own tribe or nationality, segregating them and placing them where they can not even associate or see one of their own kind.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 21, after the word "supervision," to insert "and control;" so as to read:

That all expenditure of money appropriated for school purposes in this act shall be at all times under the supervision and direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and in all respects in conformity with such conditions, rules, and regulations as to the conduct and methods of instruction and expenditure of money as may be from time to time prescribed by him, subject to the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Interior, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was under the subhead "Miscellaneous," on page 15, after line 8, to insert:

That section 2 of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the acquiring of rights of way of railroad companies through Indian reservations, Indian lands, and Indian allotments, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1899, be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That such right of way shall not exceed 50 feet in width on each side of the center line of the road, except where there are heavy cuts and fills, when it shall not exceed 100 feet in width on each side of the road, and may include grounds adjacent thereto for station buildings, depots, machine shops, side tracks, turn-outs, and water stations, not to exceed 200 feet in width by a length of 3,000 feet, and not more than one station to be located within any one continuous length of 10 miles of road: Provided, That this section shall apply to all rights of way heretofore granted to railroads in the Indian Territory where no provisions defining the width of the right of way are set out in the act granting the same."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Indian agents—Proviso," on page 19, after line 24, to strike out:

The appropriations for the salaries of Indian agents shall not take effect nor become available in any case for or during the time in which any officer of the Army of the United States shall be engaged in the performance of the duties of Indian agent at any of the agencies above named; and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, may devolve the duties of any Indian agency or part thereof upon the superintendent of the Indian school located at such agency or part thereof whenever in his judgment such superintendent can properly perform the duties of such agency. And the superintendent upon whom such duties devolve shall give bond as other Indian agents.

And to insert:

That no army officer shall be engaged in the performance of the duties of Indian agent.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that that amendment may be passed over. It is a very important one.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over at the request of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, under the subhead "Truxton Canyon School," on page 23, line 2, after the word "reservation," to strike out "(four hundred and ninety thousand dollars);" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided further, That when said irrigation system is in successful operation, and the Indians have become self-supporting, the cost of operating the said system shall be equitably apportioned upon the lands irrigated, and to the annual charge shall be added an amount sufficient to pay back into the Treasury the cost of the work within thirty years, suitable deductions being made for the amounts received from disposal of lands which now form a part of said reservation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Sherman Institute," on page 24, after line 11, to strike out:

For the purpose of removing obstructions from the bed of the stream which drains into the Eel River in the Round Valley Reservation, Mendocino County, Cal., $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, after line 15, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend not to exceed $100,000 to purchase for the use of the Indians in California now residing on reservations which do not contain land suitable for cultivation, and for Indians who are not now upon reservations in said State, suitable tracts or parcels of land, water, and water rights in said State of California, and have constructed the necessary ditches, flumes, and reservoirs for the purpose of irrigating said lands, and the irrigation of any lands now occupied by Indians in said State, and to construct suitable buildings upon said lands, and to fence the tracts of land so purchased, and fence, survey, and mark the boundaries of such Indian reservations in the State of California as the Secretary of the Interior may deem proper. One hundred thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

Mr. KEAN. Before that amendment is acted on, Mr. President, I should like to hear the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] explain it.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, my friend from New Jersey is coming out to California this season, and I shall then have an opportunity of explaining this matter to him at length. I will only say now that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, after thoroughly considering all the surrounding conditions of those people in our State, has recommended this appropriation as being a most meritorious one, and one for which there is urgent need. I am sure when my friend from New Jersey understands the matter fully, he will not object to the amendment.

Mr. KEAN. I do not object to it, Mr. President.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask that we now go back to page 12, to the total in line 23. There was a mistake in putting the words "and sixty," in line 17. "Sixty" and "eighteen" were added by the committee to "fifteen," in line 21, making the total there $493,000. The total in lines 23 and 24 is incorrect; but the words "and sixty" should be dropped out.

My recollection is now very clear that two provisions were inserted, one of $60,000, and one of $18,000; but they were put in the wrong place. On page 12 the words "and sixty" were put under the wrong heading. They were dropped out from that heading and added in the next clause, where "fifteen" was increased by "sixty" and by "eighteen," so that the words "and sixty" should be dropped out of the bill. It is a mistake in the printing or the preparation of the bill.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator is correct about that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment in line 17, on page 12, will be restated.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, line 17, before the word "thousand," the amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs is to strike out "and sixty."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, this amendment will be regarded as disagreed to. It is disagreed to; and the total, in line 23, on page 24, will stand as proposed to be amended by the committee at "$1,793,000."

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, under the head of "Idaho," on page 26, after line 19, to insert:

That there be appropriated from the moneys of the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $25,000 for completing the survey on the Fort Lemhi and the Fort Hall Indian reservations, in Idaho; expenses in connection therewith in the office of the surveyor-general for Idaho, and for the examination of said surveys; also for a reconnoissance survey and preparation of plans for a comprehensive irrigation system for Indian lands and lands ceded by the act of June 6, 1900, on the Fort Hall Reservation, in Idaho, including consideration of a possible storage system.

That before any of the lands in the Lemhi Reservation, in Idaho, ceded by the agreement concluded on May 14, 1880, set forth in the act of February 23, 1889 (25 Stat., p. 687), the provisions of which are accepted by agreement executed December 28, 1905, by a majority of all of the adult male members belonging on or occupying the said reservation, and approved by the President on January 27, 1906, be opened to settlement or entry, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall cause to be prepared a schedule of the improved lands to be abandoned, with a description of the improvements thereon and the name of the Indian occupant, a duplicate of which shall be filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Before entry shall be allowed of any tract of land occupied and cultivated and included in the schedule aforesaid, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the improvements on said tract to be appraised and sold to the highest bidder.

No sale of such improvements shall be for less than the appraised value. The purchaser of such improvements shall have thirty days after such purchase for preference right of entry of the lands upon which the improvements purchased by him are situated, not to exceed 160 acres: Provided, That the proceeds of the sale of such improvements shall be paid to the Indians owning the same: Provided further, That any missionary or religious society to which the Government has assigned lands in said reservation may remove or dispose of the improvements thereon within a reasonable time after the removal of the Indians to the Fort Hall Reservation, and if sold the purchaser of such improvements shall have thirty days from the date of sale thereof for preference right to entry of the lands upon which the improvements purchased by him are situated, not exceeding 160 acres.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that it would be better, I think, to change the amendment, in line 19 on page 27, and to say "and the names of Indian occupants," making it plural. There are various lands there, and I take it there are a great many occupants.

Mr. CLAPP. The committee will accept the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee, on page 27, line 19, after the words "and the," by striking out "name" and inserting "names;" and in the same line, after the word "Indian," to strike out "occupant" and insert "occupants."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, under the subhead "Coeur d'Alenes (treaty)," on page 29, after line 11, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, as hereinafter provided, to sell or dispose of unallotted lands in the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation, in the State of Idaho.

That as soon as the lands embraced within the Cœur d'Alene Indian Reservation shall have been surveyed, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause allotments of the same to be made to all persons belonging to or having tribal relations on said Cœur d'Alene Indian Reservation, to each man, woman, and child 160 acres, and, upon the approval of such allotments by the Secretary of the Interior, he shall cause patents to issue therefor under the provisions of the general allotment law of the United States.

That upon the completion of said allotments to said Indians the residue or surplus lands—that is, lands not allotted or reserved for Indian school, agency, or other purposes—of the said Cœur d'Alene Indian Reservation shall be classified under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior as agricultural lands, grazing lands, timber lands, or mineral lands, and shall be appraised under their appropriate classes by legal subdivisions, with the exception of the lands classed as mineral lands, which need not be appraised, and which shall be disposed of under the general mining laws of the United States, and, upon completion of the classification and appraisement, such surplus lands, with the exception of mineral lands, shall be opened to settlement and entry, under the provisions of the homestead laws, at not less than their appraised value, in addition to the fees and commissions now prescribed by law for the disposition of lands of the value of $1.25 per acre, by proclamation of the President, which proclamation shall prescribe the manner in which these lands shall be settled upon, occupied, and entered by persons entitled to make entry thereof: Provided, That the price of said lands when entered shall be fixed by the appraisement, as herein provided for, which shall be paid in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior upon the following terms: One-fifth of the purchase price to be paid in cash at the time of entry and the balance in five equal annual installments to be paid in one, two, three, four, and five years, respectively, from and after the date of entry, and in case any entryman fails to make the annual payments, or any of them, promptly when due all rights in and to the land covered by his or her entry shall cease, and any payment theretofore made shall be forfeited and the entry canceled, and the lands shall be reoffered for sale and entry. But nothing in this act shall prevent homestead settlers from commuting their entries under section 2101 of the Revised Statutes by paying for the land entered the appraised price, receiving credit for payment previously made, but the right to commute by said entryman shall not be allowed as to any lands classified as timber land: Provided further, That the lands remaining undisposed of at the expiration of five years from the opening of the said lands to entry shall be sold to the highest bidder for cash, at not less than $1 per acre, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and that any lands remaining unsold ten years after the said lands shall have been opened to entry may be sold to the highest bidder for cash without regard to the above minimum limit of price: And provided further, That sections 16 and 36 of said lands be, and they are hereby, excepted from the foregoing provisions and are hereby granted to the State of Idaho for school purposes, and the United States shall pay to said Indians therefor the sum of $1.25 per acre: And provided also, That if the State of Idaho has made any selections under existing law in lieu of sections 16 and 36 of the lands affected by this act the acreage of such selections shall be deducted from the acreage to be paid for under the preceding proviso.

That the said lands shall be opened to settlement and entry by proclamation of the President, which proclamation shall prescribe the time when and the manner in which these lands may be settled upon, occupied, and entered by persons entitled to make entry thereof, and no person shall be permitted to settle upon, occupy, and enter any of said lands except as prescribed in such proclamation.

That the Secretary of the Interior shall reserve from said lands, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, such tracts for town-site purposes as in his opinion may be required for the future public interests, and he may cause any such reservations, or parts thereof, to be surveyed into blocks and lots of suitable size, and to be appraised and disposed of under such regulations as he may prescribe, and the net proceeds derived from the sale of such lands shall be paid to such Indians, as herein provided.

That the net proceeds arising from the sale and disposition of the lands aforesaid, including the sums paid for mineral and town-site lands, shall be, after deducting the expenses incurred from time to time in connection with the allotment, appraisement, and sales, and surveys herein provided, deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Cœur d'Alene and confederated tribes of Indians belonging and having tribal rights on the Cœur d'Alene Indian Reservation, in the State of Idaho, and shall be expended for their benefit, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in the education and improvement of said Indians and in the purchase of stock cattle, horse teams, harness, wagons, mowing machines, horserakes, thrashing machines, and other agricultural implements for issue to said Indians, and also for the purchase of material for the construction of houses or other necessary buildings, and a reasonable sum may also be expended by the Secretary, in his discretion, for the comfort, benefit, and improvement of said Indians: Provided, That a portion of the proceeds may be paid to the Indians in cash per capita, share and share alike, if in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior such payments will further tend to improve the condition and advance the progress of said Indians, but not otherwise.

That any of said lands necessary for agency, school, and religious purposes, including any lands now occupied by the agency buildings, and the site of any sawmill, gristmill, or other mill property on said lands are hereby reserved for such uses so long as said land shall be occupied for the purposes above designated: Provided, That all such reserved lands shall not exceed in the aggregate 3 section and must be selected in legal subdivisions conformable to the public surveys, such selection to be made by the Indian agent of the Cœur d'Alene Agency, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior and subject to his approval.

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby vested with full power and authority to make all needful rules and regulations as to the manner of sale, notice of same, and other matters incident to the carrying out of the provisions of this act, and with authority to reappraise and reclassify said lands if deemed necessary from time to time, and to continue making sales of the same, in accordance with the provisions of this act, until all of the lands shall have been disposed of.

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to bind the United States to find purchasers for any of said laids, it being the purpose merely to have the United States act as trustee for said Indians in the disposition and sales of said lands and to expend or pay over to them the net proceeds derived from the sales as herein provided.

That to enable the Secretary of the Interior to allot, classify, appraise, and conduct the sale and entry of said lands as herein provided the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be reimbursed from the proceeds of the sales of the aforesaid lands: Provided, That when funds shall have been procured from the first sales of the land the Secretary of the Interior may use such portion thereof as may be actually necessary in conducting future sales and otherwise carrying out the foregoing provisions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Indian Territory," on page 35, line 25, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty" and insert "fifteen;" so as to make the clause read:

For clerical work and labor connected with the sale and leasing of Creek and the leasing of Cherokee lands, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 36, to insert:

That all Choctaw and Chickasaw freedmen whose names appear upon the rolls of said tribes as approved by the Secretary of the Interior shall each have the preference right to purchase, at a valuation to be ascertained by appraisement to be hereafter made under rules and regulations prescribed by said Secretary, 80 acres of the unallotted lands of said tribes.

That there shall be reserved from allotment 1 acre of the lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes for each church under the control of or used exclusively by the Choctaw or Chickasaw freedmen; and there shall be reserved from allotment 1 acre of said lands for each school conducted by Choctaw or Chickasaw freedmen, under the supervision of the authorities of said tribes and officials of the United States, and patents shall issue, as provided by law, to the person or organization entitled to receive the same. There are also reserved such tracts as the Secretary of the Interior may approve for cemeteries; and such cemeteries may be reserved, respectively, for Indians, freedmen, and whites, as the Secretary may designate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, line 2, before the words "Indian Territory," to strike out "Wagner," and insert "Wagoner;" so as to make the clause read:

That there is appropriated, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,236, to pay Toney E. Proctor $2 per day in lieu of subsistence from August 13, 1899, until April 23, 1901, while serving as town-site appraiser of Wagoner, Ind. T., Creek Nation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, line 11, after the word "of," to strike out "orphan Indian children at the Whittaker Home, Pryor Creek, Ind. T.," and insert:

Cherokee orphan Indian children in the Indian Territory, and that the proceeds from leasing of the lands allotted to such orphan Indian children shall be used, under direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for their care and support.

So as to make the clause read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to make such contract as in his judgment seems advisable for the care of Cherokee orphan Indian children in the Indian Territory, and that the proceeds from leasing of the lands allotted to such orphan Indian children shall be used, under direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for their care and support, and for the purpose of carrying this provision into effect, the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as is necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 38, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That so much as may be necessary may be used in the employment of clerical force in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the subhead, before the word "Schools," to strike out "Superintendent of;" so as to make the subhead read "Schools."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 39, line 13, before the word "therein," to strike out "noncitizens" and insert "parents of other than Indian blood;" and in line 15, before the word "thousand," to insert "and fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

For the maintenance, strengthening, and enlarging of the tribal schools of the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole nations, and making provision for the attendance of children of parents of other than Indian blood therein, and the establishment of new schools under the control of the Department of the Interior, the sum of $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, and disbursed by him under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 39, after line 18, to insert:

That the Court of Claims be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered, upon final determination of the case or cases involving the claim of the intermarried white persons in the Cherokee Nation to share in the common property of the Cherokee people, and to be enrolled for such purpose (being Nos. 419, 420, 421, and 422, on the docket of the United States Supreme Court for October term, 1905), to ascertain and determine the amount to be paid the attorney and counsel of record for the Cherokee Indians by blood in said cases, in reimbursement of necessary expenses incurred, and as reasonable compensation for services rendered in such proceedings. Such court shall further designate the persons, class, or body of persons by whom such payment should equitably be made and the fund or funds held by the United States out of which the same shall be paid and enter a decree for the amount so found; and the sum necessary to pay the same is hereby appropriated out of the fund or funds designated by the court, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the same.

The amount awarded by the court when paid shall be in full for all expenses and services of said attorney and counsel in connection with the claim of the intermarried whites.

Mr. LODGE. That clause is not only new legislation, but it is clearly a private claim, and I make the point of order against it.

Mr. CLAPP. What is the point?

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order that it is a private claim and also new legislation.

Mr. CLAPP. I think it was held last year——

Mr. McCUMBER. What is the amendment?

Mr. CLAPP. The one relating to intermarried whites in the Cherokee Nation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CLAPP. I think it was held by the Senate last year, relying upon a case that came up three or four years ago, that where the effect of the amendment was to reach a tribal fund the amendment was not subject to the point of order.

If it were an appropriation of money outside of tribal funds, it would be.

Mr. LODGE. I do not make the point of order that this is an appropriation of money not estimated for. I make the point of order that it is obnoxious to the rule because it is new legislation, which seems to me obvious, and also that it is a private claim to pay attorneys.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts what rule provides against new legislation. It is all new legislation.

Mr. LODGE. A change of existing law. New legislation is not in order on an appropriation bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. That prohibition is against general legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. "General," we call it.

Mr. LODGE. The rule says:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill—

I said "new legislation" instead of "general legislation"— nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant be received. * * * No amendment, the object of which is to provide for a private claim, shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the purposes of this amendment, but I assume from the wording that there must be some contract existing in these cases, providing for what the committee probably considered was an exorbitant sum, and that the purpose of the amendment is to enable the court to fix a reasonable fee in lieu of the contract fee provided for.

Mr. GALLINGER. But it makes an appropriation likewise.

Mr. CARTER. But out of the tribal funds. Some member of the committee may be able to explain whether contracts exist which would take out of the tribal fund a much larger sum than the sum here contemplated.

Mr. LODGE. It does not appear from the amendment.

Mr. CARTER. It does not so appear.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment does not suggest to my mind an economy of money at the expense of the attorneys.

Mr. CARTER. I take quite the contrary view of it from that of the Senator from Massachusetts. It has frequently occurred, as the Senator is aware, that very unconscionable contracts have been made with attorneys for Indians for the payment of fees.

Mr. LODGE. That I know.

Mr. CARTER. It is probable, I take it, that the court is called upon to fix the fees, to the end that they may not be exorbitant or unjust. The facts in this case I do not pretend to understand.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not recently looked at the rule the Senator from Massachusetts invokes, but certainly it does not seem to me that this amendment can be subject to objection upon the ground that it is general legislation. It is special legislation directed toward a specific subject connected with this bill, which appropriates money for the support and care of the Indians. Wherein can it be said that this is general in its character? It applies to only one specific thing.

Mr. LODGE. I do not care to insist upon that point, though I know it is good. But the amendment is legislation providing for a private claim.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit the point of order to the Senate under Rule XX, if it is desired.

Mr. CARTER. Before that is done, I should like to have the Senator from North Dakota, or some other member of the committee, explain the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Minnesota is in charge of the bill.

Mr. CARTER. If it is for the protection of the Indians and in the interest of economy, I should vote one way. If it is merely a donation of fees, I should be differently inclined.

Mr. CLAPP. There is in the report of the committee a copy of a previous report upon this same question; first session "Fifty-ninth Congress," it reads here. I think it should be the Fifty-eighth. It will be found on page 26 of the report, and it gives a history of this matter. There are a great many cases of this kind pending to test the rights of intermarried whites with Cherokees. I think there was a contract. I forget the amount. So far as I am concerned, I would not care if the Senate once for all would make a rule that these matters should not go on this bill.

However, before any vote is taken I should like to submit an amendment, because when we vote it will probably show the want of a quorum.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest that the matter go over until to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest, if the question is to be submitted to the Senate, that the Senator from Minnesota let the matter go over, because manifestly a vote would adjourn the Senate.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask that it be passed over.

Mr. LODGE. In order that it may go in the RECORD, as the amendment is to be passed over, I have been looking at the House report to which the Senator from Minnesota called attention, in regard to the attorneys' claim, and I find that it is a report on a bill to pay claims—a perfectly proper bill, in proper form, reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, but not an appropriation bill.

Mr. CLAPP. I will explain that to the Senator. It has been the custom for a good many years, when the Senate committee had the Indian appropriation bill under consideration, for those people to bring their matters to that committee, and we made a sort of rule this winter that before we would consider matters of that character they must get a favorable report from the House. So they introduced this as a House bill, and they brought it over. That was done as a sort of partial protection to the committee.

Mr. LODGE. It was not put on the bill in the House, and I understand why, because a point of order would lie against it there, and it would have gone out in a moment. In fact, it would not have been let in for a second. Therefore it is brought around to us.

What I want to call attention to is that in the report occurs this language:

The Secretary of the Interior wrote a letter last year to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs stating that this controversy had grown out of the administration of the affairs and distribution of the property of the Cherokee people under the authority of the United States, and that some provision should be made for adjusting the claim of the attorneys for compensation.

It is defined in this very House report as a private claim. I do not mean to say it is not a good claim; I am not attempting to pass upon it; but the Senate rule as to private claims is extremely strict, and I think it would be very bad practice for us to get into to put private claims on general appropriation bills. I know nothing whatever of the merits of this claim. From what the House report says, I should suppose it was a claim that should be referred to the court for adjustment; but I do object very much to a claim of this kind, defined in the House report as a private claim, being placed on a general appropriation bill.

I wish this to go in the RECORD, because the matter will come up again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, under the subhead "Five Civilized Tribes," on page 40, line 20, after the word "Tribes," to strike out "exclusive of salaries and expenses of Commissioners;" so as to make the clause read:

For the completion of the work heretofore required by law to be done by the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, $200,000; said appropriation to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, after line 23, to insert:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to reexamine the enrollment records of the Five Civilized Tribes, for the purpose of ascertaining whether said enrollment records show that persons who were minors at the time that the enrollments were made were of Indian blood on the side of either parent, and to make such transfer of the names of such minors from one roll to another as he may now determine they are entitled to on account of the facts appearing by such enrollment records.

Mr. CARTER. In line 2, page 41, I move to strike out the word "minors;" in line 3 to strike out "were;" in line 5, on the same page, to strike out the word "minors" and insert "persons;" and at the end of line 5 to strike out the words "he may now determine."

Mr. CLAPP. What is the Senator's object in moving to strike out the words "he may now determine?"

Mr. CARTER. I do not insist upon striking them out, although they would make the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior final, I think, in deciding whether either of the parties was, as a matter of law, entitled on the record to a certain standing.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me, I want to protest against striking out those words. The history of the matter is simply this: In the other bill that came over there was an effort made to open up the roll down there. The Senate rejected that effort except where the right was based upon documentary evidence. Now, it appears that people were enrolled under a ruling at that time that the child followed the status of the mother. Since then the Secretary has held that it follows the status of the father. If it is left to the Secretary, and he desires to affirm his last position, he can do so. I do not think we ought, as a matter of law, to transfer it.

Mr. CARTER. Very well. I will withdraw that portion of the amendment relating to the words "he may now determine."

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that as he proposes to amend the clause, it would be difficult to ascertain its meaning. He proposes to strike out the word "minors," in line 2, page 41; and it will then read:

For the purpose of ascertaining whether said enrollment records show that persons who were persons at the time the enrollment was made.

Mr. CLAPP. No.

Mr. CARTER. I think the Senator does not get the reading of the amendment. The amendment as I propose to amend it would read:

For the purpose of ascertaining whether said enrollment records show that persons who were at the time that the enrollments were made of Indian blood, on the side of either parent, and to make such transfer of the names of such minors from one roll to another, as he may now determine they are entitled to, on account of the facts appearing by such enrollment records.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator strikes out the word "minors," in the second line, and does not insert anything.

Mr. CARTER. In the second line.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

The SECRETARY. Page 41, line 2, strike out the word "minors;" in line 3 strike out "were;" and in line 5 strike out the word "minors" and insert the word "persons."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, after line 7, to insert:

That the Commisioner to the Five Civilized Tribes is hereby authorized to add the names of the following persons to the final roll of the citizens by blood of the Choctaw tribe: Malinda Pickens, Morris Battiest, and Samuel Sydney Burris; and the names of the following persons to the final roll of the citizens by blood of the Chickasaw tribe: Rebecca Pitts, Maggie Wade; and the name of Nancy Bigknife to the final roll of the citizens by blood of the Cherokee tribe, the said persons being either Choctaw, Chickasaw, or Cherokee Indians by blood, whose names, through neglect on their part or on the part of their parents have been omitted from the tribal rolls: Provided, That the enrollment of said persons by the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes shall not be objected to by the said tribes, and shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. On page 41, after the amendment just agreed to, I move to insert as a new paragraph what I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. After line 22, on page 41, it is proposed to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall have prepared and printed in a permanent record book the tribal rolls of the Five Civilized Tribes, and that one copy of such record book shall be deposited in the office of the recorder in each of the recording districts for public inspection free of charge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, under the subhead "Choctaws. (Treaty)," on page 43, line 8, after the word "cents," to strike out the colon and insert a period.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. On page 43, after the word "cents," in line 8, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 43, after the word "cents," in line 8, it is proposed to insert:

And provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in case, after investigation, he deems it for the best interests of the tribe, to set aside 640 acres of Choctaw land for the benefit of Old Goodland Indian Orphan Industrial School, and to convey the same to said school in conjunction with the executive of the Choctaw tribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 43, after line 8, to strike out:

Provided, That the Court of Claims is hereby authorized and directed to hear, consider, and adjudicate the claims against the Mississippi Choctaws of the estate of Charles F. Winton, deceased, his associates and assigns, for services rendered and expenses incurred in the matter of the claims of the Mississippi Choctaws to citizenship in the Choctaw Nation, and to render judgment thereon, on the principle of quantum meriut, in such amount or amounts as may appear equitably or justly due therefor, which judgments, if any, shall be paid from any funds now or hereafter due such Choctaws by the United States. Notice of such suit shall be served on the governor of the Choctaw Nation and the Attorney-General shall appear and defend the said suit on behalf of said Choctaws.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, after line 21, to insert:

Provided, That hereafter clerks and deputy clerks of United States courts in the Indian Territory who are ex officio recorders of recording districts in said Territory, shall be allowed, out of the fees received for the recording and filing of instruments, 25 per cent in addition to the sum of compensation and actual expenses for clerk hire now provided by law.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota why the increase of 25 per cent in the pay of the clerks has become necessary?

Mr. CLAPP. That was on the recommendation of the Commissioner. The fact is that provision was in the other bill, but as it was reported in the first conference I think it was so situated that it could not properly be a subject of conference; and for that reason it was put in here.

Mr. LODGE. It is a necessary increase?

Mr. CLAPP. It was so thought by the Commissioner; and I will say that the next amendment is also an amendment that got in such shape in the other bill that it could not be the proper subject of conference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 44, after line 3, to insert:

That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved ———, 1906, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out thereof the words "Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed so as to hereafter permit any person to file an application for enrollment in any tribe where the date for filing application has been fixed by agreement between said tribe and the United States: Provided further, That nothing herein shall apply to the intermarried whites in the Cherokee Nation whose cases are now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, after line 16, to insert:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. Does the Senator from Minnesota care to go on further with the bill this evening?

Mr. CLAPP. I wish to do simply what is the pleasure of the Senate. If it is desired to have an executive session I will agree to that course.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 16, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

TRANSPORTATION OF DUTIABLE MERCHANDISE.

Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Ways and Means, presented the bill (H. R. 11037) relating to the transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PORT OF OSWEGO.

Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Ways and Means, presented the bill (H. R. 13938) to extend the privileges of the seventh section of the act approved June 10, 1880, to the port of Oswego, N. Y.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Appropriations, presented the bill (H. R. 18198) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York reserves all points of order.

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill H. R. 5976, "An act to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," the Clerk be directed to restore to the bill the part proposed to be stricken out in the amendment of the Senate No. 26 and to insert the following: On page 9, line 3, after the word "retaining," the words "tribal educational officers, subject to dismissal by the Secretary of the Interior," and restore to the bill the part proposed to be stricken out in the amendment of the Senate No. 27, and to insert in said amendment the following: On page 11, line 8, after the word "five," the words "and all such taxes levied and collected after the 31st day of December, 1905, shall be refunded."

After the word "punished," on page 11, line 21, insert "by a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out in the amendment of the Senate No. 41 insert in lieu thereof the following: "The Secretary of the Interior shall take possession of all buildings now or heretofore used for governmental, school, and other tribal purposes, together with the furniture therein and the land appertaining thereto, and appraise and sell the same at such time and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and deposit the proceeds, less expenses incident to the appraisement and sale, in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the respective tribes: Provided."

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I think I shall have to object to that.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is asking now for unanimous consent for the further consideration of the concurrent resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Ohio will reserve his objection.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the objection until I can hear some explanation. My point is this, that it looks as though we were proposing to legislate by a concurrent resolution and not in the ordinary way.

Mr. CURTIS. Not at all. In this case the resolution simply makes the bill read as it was agreed to in the conference. In the first conference report the statement was correctly made. It was printed, and in the second conference report the clerk of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs was directed to have the language printed as in the first conference report. We agreed upon it the same as we did in the first conference report. There was no disagreement at all on this subject between the conferees of the House and the conferees of the Senate, but after the clerk had prepared the report he was informed by a clerk in the Senate that the Senate could not recede with an amendment, and that the House must recede. So he struck out the words "the Senate receded" and made it read "the House receded," presented the report, and we signed it without noticing these mistakes. It was not noticed until after the report was agreed to by the Senate, too late to go back to conference. Now, if the bill goes through as it is presented here it will simply destroy three sections agreed on in conference.

Mr. KEIFER. Where is the bill now?

Mr. CURTIS. Waiting to be enrolled in the Clerk's office.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, it looks to me as though from the gentleman's statement it is a question simply of enrollment, and does not need the action of the House to correct the enrollment. It seems to me that is what the gentleman seems to seek, and not new legislation.

Mr. CURTIS. Not new legislation at all.

Mr. KEIFER. I hardly think the House need act upon that. Better let it go to the Committee on Enrollment and have it enrolled correctly.

Mr. CURTIS. The Clerk wants the resolution passed.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interfere with action that has already been taken by the House or by the Senate. My protest is against putting legislation in a bill after it is passed or gone to the President by some sort of legislation. We had a case recently here, but I yielded on account of the great importance of it, but I want to insist that this must stop here; but if this is only a question of correcting the enrollment, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire of the gentleman when this conference report was presented to the House Saturday was it known that the report was incorrect?

Mr. CURTIS. It was known just before the report was taken up, but it had been signed and had passed the Senate, and we thought best not to call it back and go to the conference again.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to this fact: That the conference report printed in the RECORD presented to the House was adopted upon the assumption that it was accurate, while all the time it was known to the gentleman in charge of the report that it was not accurate.

Mr. CURTIS. It was not known until after it was printed in the RECORD.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Known, however, which is the important thing, when it was acted upon by the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I hope the gentleman will not object, because this correction only carries out the intention of the conference report. We report this resolution so the bill will read exactly as we had agreed upon it in conference. If it is left as it is now, the bill will be absolutely injurious, and we will simply be compelled to resort to other means, and an original bill probably, in order to correct it. The trouble arose in this way: The clerks made a mistake and struck out the House amendments instead of the Senate amendments.

Mr. CURTIS. They made the House recede instead of the Senate recede.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I would like to ask the gentleman one question before I say whether I will object or not. Was this supposed error known to the conferees when the House acted upon the matter?

Mr. CURTIS. It was not known when the conferees' report was presented, but it was discovered just before the conferees' report was called up in the House.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I object, then, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I demand a second.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. A second is considered as ordered, and the gentleman from Kansas is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Missouri to twenty minutes.

Mr. CURTIS. I reserve my time and would ask the gentleman from Missouri to use his if he desires to use any.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to this manner of legislating. It seems, according to the facts as we have learned them this morning, that when the House was asked to act upon and adopt this conference report it was known by the conferees upon the part of the House that the report was inaccurate. These gentlemen, instead of taking the House into their confidence, concluded that they would retain to themselves this information, would not impart it to the House, but by suppressing it would induce the House to adopt a conference report and then later on would come in with a resolution like this and ask the House to doctor the bill or the conference report after the House and Senate had acted upon it.

It is not necessary for me to go into the question of whether the conferees did or did not do what they ought to have done in the discharge of their duty to the House. They saw fit to ask the House to adopt a report which at the time they did not wish to have adopted and which possibly in their estimation the House would not have adopted if the House had been put in possession of the facts which these gentleman had.

Now, aside from all that this method of legislating, in my judgment, is an exceedingly bad one. There are various ways which are legitimate and proper for reaching the end in view. There could be, perhaps, by unanimous consent a setting aside of the approval or adoption by the House of that conference report. But whether there are or are not many ways, whether there is any good way or is no good way of doing it, this is a bad method of legislating resorted to only lately and one that ought not to be encouraged.

Not very long since a request was made after a bill, by resolution of this House and the Senate, had been withdrawn from the President for unanimous consent to doctor up that bill so as to meet the objections of the President and avoid the possibility or the certainty, as the case might be, of a Presidential veto. In an earlier instance during this session a measure was doctored up in this new and very bad way. This legislation can not be so important and the difficulties in the way of securing it can not be so great as to warrant this method of procedure. I presume that the House and the Senate, by unanimous consent or in some other legitimate and proper method, can put these conferees or other conferees again in possession of the subject-matter at dispute between the two Houses, and that in a regular way. There may be reported to this House and to the other a real agreement of the conferees. But one thing aside from all other things that it seems to me ought to induce every Member of this House to vote against the adoption of this resolution is the fact that the gentlemen having the matter in charge deliberately asked the House to adopt that which they say the conference committee did not adopt, expecting, I presume, for reasons which to them were satisfactory, but which to the House ought not to be, that by this method or some other method the House later on, acting in ignorance by their guidance, misled by their concealment of important facts, might bring about the condition of things which they would like to have brought about.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the gentleman mean to insinuate that I, as one of the members of that conference committee, prevented this House from understanding in some insidious way the merits of this bill?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I do not mean to insinuate anything. I mean to say, if I have understood the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] correctly—and if I have not I hope he or somebody else will correct me—if I have understood the gentleman from Kansas correctly, I mean to say that when this report was acted upon by the House the members of the conference committee upon the part of the House knew that the report was not correct, and did not disclose to the House that fact.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state to the gentleman that I did not know that fact.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The gentleman from Texas has acquitted himself of knowing.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman's insinuations are unwarranted.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I am not insinuating at all. The gentleman, perhaps, is a little "touchy" on this subject, because he failed to get through one of these doctored resolutions some time since, when there had been a report and had been a provision in a bill that $1.50 an acre was a proper minimum price for land which the gentleman himself afterwards said was well worth at least $5 and from that to $100, and $5 was the proper minimum rate.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will permit, I wish to state I made no such statement as that on this floor, but I did state that much of the land was worth $5 an acre, and for that which was worth less than $5 a minimum of $1.50 was not unreasonable.

Mr. DE ARMOND. There is no need for discussion on that subject. The RECORD will show what the gentleman said, and if I am in error as to what it does show I will try to make amends as far as I can. I will say that my recollection is—and I am satisfied it is correct—that the gentleman did say that $5 was a proper minimum rate, yet he joined in a report to the effect that $1.50 was the proper minimum rate. But that is aside from the matter now up.

The gentleman from Texas says he did not know these errors were in the report when it was acted upon. That disposes of the matter so far as he is concerned. I understood the gentleman from Kansas to say that he did know. If I am wrong, he can correct me.

Mr. CURTIS. The matter was called to my attention about the time the report was brought up in the House. I did not know how serious the mistakes were. I did not think they were very material. In fact, if the pending bill should pass without the adoption of this resolution, while it would make three sections look badly, it would still be a good bill. It was simply to correct these errors that I offered this resolution this morning, and to make the report read as it was agreed to. There was no intention to deceive the House. The fact that we did not ask to go back to conference was because of the trouble we had in conference over that bill; and after the conference report had been agreed to by the Senate these mistakes in the three sections were discovered.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Now, Mr. Speaker, the only question is whether it is not true that when the gentleman presented this report to the House he knew there were errors which later he expected to have corrected.

Mr. CURTIS. I knew there were three mistakes, but the fact was brought to my attention just before the report was called up.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I will ask the gentleman from Kansas, then, why he did not delay the calling up of the bill until he ascertained as a matter of fact whether there were errors?

Mr. CURTIS. The gentleman from New York, chairman of the committee, had charge of the conference report. He said he was going to call it up. I was informed of the situation afterwards, while sitting beside him, when he was ready to call up the report, but did not have time to explain to him and did not know at that time the extent of the errors made by the clerk of the Senate committee.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Now, Mr. Speaker, without going further into it, and acquitting everybody of evil intent, it seems that some gentlemen on the committee either knew or had such information as led them to believe, or which, if followed, would give them full information, that there were three errors in the report. They saw proper to call it up and have it passed in the House—saying nothing about acting properly or improperly—and I do not wish to be understood as passing judgment upon that at all; but instead of delayed action, in order that they could ascertain whether the report was correct or not, and if incorrect, how material or immaterial the mistakes were, or are supposed to be, the gentleman did call it up; did have it acted upon; did have it adopted by this House.

Now, then, the enrolling officer, as I understand it, finds as a matter of fact that these mistakes do exist in the enrollment of the bill if it is enrolled as the House passed it. Is it not so?

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, no. The bill is waiting now to be enrolled.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Well, the bill is not yet enrolled. If enrolled as the House passed it, which is the way it should be enrolled, it would not be enrolled as its friends would like to have it, and as they say it ought to be in accordance with the agreement of the conference committee. Now, why not, instead of pursuing this extraordinary method of changing the action of the House and Senate by a resolution such as this, reconsider the action by which the House adopted the erroneous report, have the errors corrected, and have it acted upon in a proper way? We know, Mr. Speaker, how fruitful of evil bad precedents are in this body, and all bodes where precedents are followed or frequently consulted. I have not any kind of doubt about a method of legislation that attempts to fix up bills or resolutions after having passed both branches of Congress by this species of resolutions. It is to make a very bad precedent by a course of procedure that ought never to be resorted to unless there be the most imperative necessity for it, unless it be the only available method of accomplishing something very imperative as well as very urgent. In this particular case there is no necessity for any extraordinary action at this time. It is of importance to the House and the country, far beyond the importance of any action on this bill or any particular bill, perhaps, that we should proceed in the regular way and not in this manner. For instance, a bill might be passed in the House upon full consideration, and after the passage of the bill—a day or two days thereafter—a request for unanimous consent might be made to materially change it, and change it in a way that if the change had been made before it was considered it would not have passed the House at all.

That request might be made when few Members were in the House and when nobody had a warning or notice that it would be made, when an opportune time had been chosen to make it, and thus the real judgment of the House might be set at fault and bad legislation might be put through after the House had deliberately passed a good bill, the good legislation giving way to bad legislation, pursuant to bad precedent.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask whether or not the gentleman thinks the bill should be enrolled as agreed upon by the conferees?

Mr. DE ARMOND. No; not unless the House passed it that way. The bill should be enrolled as the House passed it or not enrolled at all. If the bill was not reported according to the agreement of the conferees, the action of the House upon it—and I think also the action of the Senate upon it—ought to be vacated, and it ought to be acted upon in each body in accordance with the agreement of the conferees.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If we can correct it before it is enrolled according to the agreement of the conferees, is it not just as well to enroll it in that way?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I think not.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Why commit another error and enroll the bill as it was passed by the House and Senate?

Mr. DE ARMOND. The bill as the gentleman wants it enrolled never passed the House.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The bill now enrolled never received the approval of the conferees of the House and the Senate, and you are seeking to enroll a bill not approved by the conferees.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I am not seeking to do anything of the kind. The conferees are a large element in the disposition of the business of Congress, so large that frequently those upon the conference committee may conclude that they are of more consequence than the House which appointed them. The bill was passed by the House, and if it was not passed as the conferees agreed upon it, it was because the conferees did not submit the report as the conference committee had agreed to it. Now, the gentleman's proposition is whether the action of the House had better be set aside to conform with the action of the conferees in this irregular way, or whether the action of the House is to stand rather than the understanding or agreement of the conferees, not made known to the House when it ought to have been made known to it. If the gentleman stands in the position of regarding the conferees as superior to the House, he has a perfect right to occupy that position, but I prefer occupying, on the other hand, the position of holding that the House itself is really superior to the conferees created by it.

What did the House pass? The House passed a bill which it is now conceded was erroneous because it did not contain the agreement of the conferees. What is to be enrolled? The bill as the House passed it. If it is erroneous, it is because the House was led into the error. I think the proper way would be, instead of asking the House by unanimous consent to adopt this resolution, and, secondly, asking the House by a two-thirds vote to adopt it, to ask the House to consent that the action adopting this conference report, erroneous, as the gentleman says, be set aside. That would be the proper course here, it seems to me, and the proper course in the Senate. Let the two bodies act on the report of the conferees when that report is corrected; that is my view about it. I do not know anything about the merits of this correction, or the demerits of it; I am speaking about the method, and the method is a bad one. Now is as good a time as any other time to stamp reprobation upon it instead of approval. The question is whether the action of the House shall stand above the errors of the conference committee in their report. Let us correct in the proper way and not in an improper way.

I say again, in conclusion, that I do not mean to impute any misconduct or any wrong motive to anybody connected with this matter; I am speaking of the question simply as we have it; that is all. The agreement of the conference committee was reported to the House erroneously, adopted by the House as it was reported; and the proper course is to ask the House to annul that action instead of patching it up by such action as is proposed in this resolution. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, when my attention was called to the error in the three amendments I was advised that it could be corrected in either one of two ways. One was to withdraw the report after it had passed the Senate and send it back to conference, and the other by a concurrent resolution. This latter course was pursued, as I was advised it was done in the celebrated Dingley bill to correct an error discovered in it, and so we concluded to follow that course. There was absolutely no intention to mislead the House, but we had so much trouble with the bill in conference that we thought it better to be done in this way. If the sections are omitted, the bill would still be effective, but it would prevent the Secretary of the Interior from taking possession of tribal property in the Indian Territory, and it would cause the inhabitants down there to continue to pay tribal taxes, which we have eliminated by the bill. Now, the concurrent resolution simply authorizes the enrolling clerk to make the three amendments read as we agreed they should read, the clerk having struck out the words "the Senate receded with an amendment" and inserted "the House receded with an amendment," which consequently omitted the matter which had been stricken out by the Senate and simply inserted the amendment that been proposed by the House, thus leaving the sections incomplete. Your committee thought the proper course to pursue would be to offer the concurrent resolution, and I hope that the House will indorse the action.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Do I understand that the errors which were made were such as to change the legal effect of the bill?

Mr. CURTIS. Not at all, except to leave out in one section matter that the Senate and the House agreed should stay in the bill, and would prevent, if left out, the Secretary of the Interior from taking possession of the schools in the Indian Territory at this time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, was that error discovered before the conference report was adopted in the House?

Mr. CURTIS. After it was adopted in the Senate and just a moment before it was called up in the House my attention was called to it, and I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] was recognized within a minute afterwards. It does not change the legal effect.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. In how many particulars would the legislative effect be changed, if in any, if this resolution passed?

Mr. CURTIS. There are three sections, one that provides for the Secretary of the Interior to take possession of the schools of the Indian Territory——

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Now, if the law passes in its present shape, that will be the effect of that section.

Mr. CURTIS. That would be left out. The second is the collection of taxes. We provide in the bill that no tribal taxes shall be collected after this time. If that is left out, the tribes will have a right to continue to collect taxes. The last is the section authorizing the Secretary to take charge of the school property. Those would be left out and be subject to future legislation if this concurrent resolution is not agreed to. Both Houses have agreed to all three of them. There was no dispute about it in conference. It is simply a correction of a mistake made by the clerk of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands a vote. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the concurrent resolution.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules were suspended and the concurrent resolution was passed.

LOANS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. SHARTEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Banking and Currency I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 8973) to amend section 5200, Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to national banks, with the committee amendments thereto, and with the further amendment, on page 2, line 2, inserting the words "of such" after the word "total," which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5200 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5200. The total liabilities to any association of any person or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of a company or firm the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed one-tenth part of the amount of the capital stock of such associations, actually paid in and unimpaired, and one-tenth part of its unimpaired surplus fund: Provided, however, That the total of such liabilities shall in no event exceed 20 per cent of the capital stock of the association. But the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values, and the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person negotiating the same shall not be considered as money borrowed."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill which the Clerk has just reported, with the amendments thereto as reported. Is a second demanded?

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. SHARTEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Missouri is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. SHARTEL. Mr. Speaker, section 5200 of the Revised Statutes, relating to national banks, provides that a national bank can only loan an amount equal to 10 per cent of its capital stock to any one person, firm, or corporation. This bill is intended as an amendment to authorize a national bank to make loans equal to one-tenth of its capital and one-tenth of its surplus funds up to an amount equal to its capital stock, the limitation providing that the total loan liability to any person, firm, or individual shall not exceed 20 per cent of the capital stock. The committee investigating this matter believe that there is a great demand upon the part of the banks and upon the part of the people of the United States who transact business with the banks that the limit of these loans should be increased. I do not know of any State in which the trust companies and State banks are not authorized to loan from 20 to 30 per cent of their capital stock to one person, firm, or individual, so that the national bank is placed at a great disadvantage in the transaction of its business and in the accommodation of its customers in competition with State institutions. The American Bankers' Association wanted an act authorizing the loan of an amount equal to 10 per cent of the capital stock and 10 per cent of all the surplus fund. The committee, however, investigating it decided that there should be some limitation on the amount of the surplus fund that could be used for loaning purposes for the reason that banks might be organized with a very small capital and a very large surplus fund, thus allowing the stockholders to escape the double liability on their stock, so we have placed this committee amendment on this bill, limiting the amount to 20 per cent of the capital stock that can be loaned to one person, firm, or individual. There are some banks in the United States whose capital stock is so small and surplus fund so large that this bill will not relieve the situation as regards that class of banks.

The only way they can come within the law will be to increase their capital stock so as to be able to loan a sufficient amount to one person or individual to meet the demands of their customers. This amendment has been recommended in some form or other by every Comptroller of the Currency for the last thirty years. They have found under existing business conditions that it is nearly impossible for a national bank to accommodate its customers, to transact the business of the country within this limit of 10 per cent. Now, it might be said that the banks are pressing for this legislation. That is probably true, but at the same time the people who are demanding it are customers of the banks, who are coming to the banks demanding and asking for larger accommodations to carry on their business. I think it is a very meritorious measure and one that would be of great benefit to the business interests of the country. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. YOUNG. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SHARTEL. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG. I was not able to hear all the gentleman said. Do I understand the only effect that this bill has is to increase the amount which a national bank may loan to one person from 10 to 20 per cent of its capital?

Mr. SHARTEL. Yes, sir; I will answer in this way——

Mr. YOUNG. And does it allow them to loan any amount upon the surplus in addition to that?

Mr. SHARTEL. Up to 10 per cent of the surplus. That is, a bank with $50,000 capital and $50,000 surplus can now loan $5,000 to one person or individual. Under this law they could loan $10,000. If they had $25,000 surplus, they could loan $7,500, but if they had more than $50,000 surplus they could not loan more than 20 per cent of the original capital stock.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SHARTEL. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Can the gentleman say what, in his judgment, will be the aggregate increase of loanable capital?

Mr. SHARTEL. Well, it will be about 33⅓ per cent.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How many millions would that make in the United States?

Mr. SHARTEL. Well, I could not tell you. I have not computed that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. You could not approximate, but it would be a third more than to-day?

Mr. SHARTEL. Yes, sir; just about. I will say further to the gentleman that this will relieve the conflict between the Treasury Department over excessive loans, with about 4,000 national banks. In the cases of about 1,000 banks the surplus fund is so large and capital so small that this bill will not relieve the situation, and they will have to come within the provisions by increasing their capital stock.

Mr. GRAHAM. In reply to the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin, I would state that this bill will not increase the loans in national banks one-third, for the Comptroller of the Currency has stated that a great many of the banks have been so construing the law as to permit them to loan on the strength of their surplus as well as capital stock, but the Comptroller has notified them that they are violating the law, and they must discontinue this practice.

Under this bill all banks can in the future do lawfully what some of them at times have been doing in violation of law. While all the national banks in my county—Allegheny, Pa.—desire this bill, and the clearing house has petitioned for its passage, the business men are as much, if not more, interested than the banks, as is evidenced by the many letters I have received in its favor.

Quite recently two of the large banks in Pittsburg have been compelled to enlarge their capital by a stock dividend of a portion of their surplus, so as to enable them to give legally the necessary accommodation to some of the large corporations doing business with them.

Mr. SHARTEL. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, the demand for this legislation, so far as I am aware, and so far as has been disclosed before the Committee on Banking and Currency, comes from the banks themselves. They are demanding the right to decrease the number of borrowers, as far as possible, by increasing their capacity to loan to one borrower over the amount the law now provides. The policy of the present law, as I understand, is to make the capital of any given bank available to as many people as possible without destroying the efficiency of the bank. This bill comes from the demands of the large concerns of the country to get hold of all the available capital. The purpose is to override the principle involved in the present law and to respond to that demand that is prevalent over the country that the little man stand out and give way to the big one.

Now, strange as it may appear, the demand for this legislation is based, according to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, upon the absolute disregard of the law as it now stands on the part of a vast majority of the bankers of the country. In a letter read before our committee, the Comptroller stated that 75 per cent, at least, of the bankers of the nation now absolutely disregard the law, and he said that he himself disregards the law in failing to move for the penalty provided in the law—the forfeiture of the bank's charter in case it violates the law of its being.

Certainly if Congress responds to the demands of the banks and removes some of their objections to the present law by increasing their capacity to loan to one individual, firm, or concern, I insist that if we want the law obeyed we ought to prescribe a penalty for the violation of this section. But it is the purpose of the majority that no penalty shall be prescribed. It is the purpose of the banks not to keep this law when it is written and put upon the statute books. I am not overstating the case at all when I say that not only have they failed to keep the law that is now upon the statute books, but they are demanding the right to violate this law when you increase their loaning capacity, as contemplated in this bill. And they will not submit to a penalty being prescribed, as it ought to be, for the violation of this law.

Now, here we stand, the great Congress of the American nation, admitting that some limitation is necessary, admitting that it would not be proper to allow these banking associations to lend all of their capital to one man, person, or firm. We acknowledge the necessity of at least the limitation that is in this proposed bill, and yet we refuse, when we know this necessity exists, to provide a penalty for the enforcement of this law.

Why, the Comptroller of the Currency says that the penalty of the present law is too severe. He says, "If I go ahead and forfeit the charter of one of these institutions, I kill it. That penalty is too severe and I will not enforce it." That is what he says in his report, and I believe myself that the penalty is too severe, and we know that always when a penalty is too severe it is equivalent to no penalty at all. I offered an amendment to this bill in the committee making a lesser penalty, but even that was voted down, and I said at that time, and I here prophesy, that they are not going to keep this law.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. State what your penalty is.

Mr. GILLESPIE. It was that if any officer, agent, or employee of any banking association shall violate the provisions of this section he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $5,000. But we are told that if you go into court to prosecute the official, agent, or employee of a national bank, that prosecution, if begun, will destroy the bank. Not necessarily. Under the present penalty if the Comptroller of the Currency wants to go in and forfeit a charter, he would be punishing all people interested in the bank, the stockholders and all, and a great many of them may be and probably would be innocent; but, under my amendment, we only punish those officers, agents, and employees of the bank who are guilty. I simply want to protest against this method of rushing a bill through the Congress of the United States without the right to offer that amendment. I believe it ought to be in this law. If we expect to pass a law and expect that law to be obeyed, we ought to fix a definite and specific penalty for its violation.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Do I understand that the gentleman is opposing the passage of the bill?

Mr. GILLESPIE. Yes, sir; I am opposing the passage of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The effect of building up a surplus, as I understand it, by a bank is to strengthen the security——

Mr. DALZELL. We can not hear a word that is going on over there.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I was wanting to get the opinion of the gentleman from Texas as to whether or not the effect of this bill would be to cause the national banks to build up a surplus, and thereby strengthen the security to the depositors and people who do business with them; if that is beneficial in its effect, what objection can there be to the passage of the bill? Now, I do not know what the effect will be. I would like to have his opinion as to whether or not that will be its effect.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman's inquiry, I will say that I am also not a banker, and there has been little evidence before our committee on this proposition. Really I do not think it affects the question very seriously one way or another about building up a surplus. I do not know whether the effect of this bill will be to cause the banks to build up their surplus or take from their surplus. The only effect of the bill is to decrease the number of borrowers, to enable the bank to be able to accommodate the large borrowers; and my position is that it gives the large borrowers an open field and crowds out the small borrowers.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Let us take a concrete case for illustration. Say there is a little bank with a capital of $25,000 in your home city. It is required under the present law to add so much to its surplus each year until it has a surplus equal to 20 per cent of the capital stock. In other words, it has to reach $5,000 surplus before it can use all its earnings in the way of dividends. Now, will the effect of this bill be to cause that bank to build up a surplus, say, equal to its capital stock, so that they may thereby double the amount which they may lend to any one individual? At present the bank can only lend $2,500.

Mr. GILLESPIE. One-tenth of the capital stock.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. One-tenth of the capital stock. Now, by building up the surplus to $25,000 it will be able, should this bill become a law, to lend to one individual $5,000, and yet by building up the surplus can you say that they have diminished the number of people among whom they are to loan their funds? Have they not rather increased the security which is available to depositors?

Mr. GILLESPIE. I think not, Mr. Speaker. Under this bill they could use the surplus as a basis for loans, and then under certain contingencies withdraw that surplus, and they can use their surplus as a basis of increasing their loan to any one individual, firm, or corporation.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GILLESPIE. Certainly.

Mr. POWERS. If I understand, the gentleman's objections, or one of them, are, this will enable the banks to decrease the number of persons to whom they will loan, and only lend in large sums to some particular corporation or individual?

Mr. GILLESPIE. That is one of them.

Mr. POWERS. If I understand the principles of banking, there is no national banking association but what would prefer to lend $10,000 to ten men rather than to lend it to one, and if they can pick out a number of patrons to whom they can lend their money in the very best way, why should the national banks desire to destroy one of the very best things by which they increase their working profits?

Mr. GILLESPIE. They do not have always the safest opinion of what is their own interest, though I concede that their ingenuity is almost unerring along that line. I believe in the principle stated by the gentleman—that is, that a bank should have the greatest number of borrowers possible—but to increase the amount of the loan, as is contended by those who are in favor of the bill, will decrease the number of borrowers and lessen the cost of administration to the bank.

Mr. POWERS. Is it not the policy of this bill to have made legal that which is now perhaps done illegally, and will it not tend to increase the amount of surplus?

Mr. GILLESPIE. The bill from that standpoint is to make a condition lawful that is now unlawful.

Mr. POWERS. I do not so understand. It does not make anything lawful that is unlawful, but answers the demand of the community and of bankers all over the country, where it can be done in safety, to allow the banks to lend 10 per cent of the surplus—not exceeding 10 per cent of the capital.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Does not the gentleman believe a penalty direct and specific ought to be put in this bill for a violation of this provision?

Mr. POWERS. I believe that a penalty such as the gentleman proposes ought not to be put into this bill, and I will state to him why. In the hurry of making loans I do not believe there is one man in a bank in ten that could tell you right off in a moment what the amount ought to be, and when you understand, with all the clerks and the employees, they can not tell in a moment how much it ought or how much it ought not to be.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Will the gentleman permit me, in that connection, to say that my amendment only undertakes to punish where the act is knowingly done, and therefore it obviates the difficulty just suggested by him. I say there should be a penalty exacted. These institutions should not be permitted to violate the law at their own will. It is the purpose of the banks to defeat this penalty, and they do not intend to keep this law when you enact it. I think if the Congress of the United States recognizes that some limitation is necessary it ought to rise in its might and put a penalty there that will keep them within the limitation.

I reserve the balance of my time

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. GILLESPIE. I reserve that.

Mr. SHARTEL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, my experience with bank men and national banks leads me to the conclusion that the bogie which has been set up by the gentleman from Texas is actually without foundation. Bank men do not wish to break the law, and this bill, if it were given a proper title, would be called "A bill to aid the banks to aid the public to do business." As has been stated by the gentleman from Missouri, it has been recommended by every Comptroller of the Currency for the last forty years; and if it were necessary forty years ago or thirty years ago or twenty years ago, or even ten years ago, it is doubly necessary now, for it must be apparent to every man on this floor that the business of this country has increased to enormous proportions. It has practically doubled in the last ten years; but the number of business houses doing business during that time has not doubled, which means that houses actually in business are doing more business than they were before. Therefore it is necessary at certain times that they have greater facilities for borrowing.

Now, every business man wishes to borrow money of his own bank, because the relations between the banker and his customer, if the customer is a borrower, should be of the closest character, and it is for the interest of the bank that its own customer should make his loans with his own bank, because the bank knows the condition of the customer, but does not know the condition of the man who makes the paper which otherwise the bank must go into the market to buy. Therefore, in my judgment, this bill, if adopted, would make banks safer, would tend to prevent bank failures, and therefore would strengthen the whole business situation. Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE] who has just spoken, if I understand him correctly, does not object to the principles of this bill, but wishes a penalty attached. There is a penalty now, which applies to infractions of the national banking laws. He has stated, and I believe every man who knows anything of it agrees, that this penalty has been too severe, and that is, perhaps, the reason it has not been enforced. But under this proposed law, if it is adopted, my judgment is that 0.999 of all loans made would naturally be made without infringing on the law at all. And bank men will not voluntarily break the law if they can have this latitude. That being the case, I want to read the present penalty, to show that if they do break the law their punishment is entirely in the hands of the Comptroller of the Currency, and if the Comptroller does not enforce the law, that is not the fault of Congress. The present law is as follows:

If the directors of any national banking association shall knowingly violate or knowingly permit any of the business agents or servants of the association to violate any of the provisions of this title, all the rights, privileges, and franchises of the association shall be thereby forfeited. Such violation shall, however, be determined and adjudged by a proper circuit, district, or Territorial court of the United States, in a suit brought for that purpose, by the Comptroller in his own name, before the association shall be declared dissolved.

That is sufficient punishment to suit anyone or to apply to any case. If this law is violated under the proposed form, it will be violated by those banking men who wish to break the law for their own personal benefit. It will not be violated by banking men who wish to aid the public, because they can safely, in my judgment, aid the public without violating any of these provisions. Therefore, as I said before, it is entirely in the hands of the Comptroller of the Currency whether he shall see the proposed law enforced or not.

Mr. SHARTEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes' time to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. PUJO].

Mr. PUJO. Mr. Speaker, the object of this legislation is purely corrective. In 1863 the national banking act was adopted, and the present provision limiting the right of any one individual, firm, or corporation to borrow more than 10 per cent of the capital of the bank was enacted into legislation. Some forty years after that time we propose to permit the national banks of this country to lend to any of their customers 10 per cent of their capital stock and 10 per cent of their paid-in, unimpaired surplus. The result of this legislation will be to add to the legal lending power of the national banking institutions of this country some $44,000,000. The capital of the national banks at the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency was some $800,000,000, and the surplus $442,000,000. In a short time the surplus will equal the capital stock, and the legal lending capacity of the banks to individual borrowers will amount to $80,000,000.

The principal objection to this legislation offered by the gentleman from Texas is that it is a demand on the part of the banks and not a demand in behalf of the people of this country, and that it is proposed legislation in order to meet the violations of law that have been committed on the part of officers of these institutions in the past.

I think that the gentleman is in error in relation to his premise and, naturally, as to his conclusions. The volume of business in the United States has increased wonderfully in the last forty years. The banking institutions of this country would prefer to limit their loans to their customers to 5 or 10 per cent rather than to make them in larger amounts to anyone, conceding the borrower's ability to pay. But the demands of business are so great that the laws must be modified so as to meet these changed conditions.

It is in no sense a movement on the part of the officers of the banks to increase the amount which may be legally loaned to one person or firm in order to further violate the law, but it is legislation which has been offered and approved by the Committee on Banking and Currency in order to endeavor to secure the enforcement of the law in the future.

The law has not been enforced in the past because the penalty, the forfeiture of the charter, was too drastic.

But the committee believes if this proposed bill should be enacted into legislation that in the future the law will be enforced and that the national banks of the country will be held to the limitations fixed by the law—10 per cent of the surplus and 10 per cent of the capital.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. PUJO. Certainly.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Does the gentleman favor a penalty being affixed to this section?

Mr. PUJO. I do not favor a criminal penalty being affixed to this section, because in not one State in the Union is there a criminal penalty imposed for the violation of what you may at most call a "directory financial provision."

What is the penalty in the State of Texas for the violation of the usury law, how long must one stay in jail in Texas, or what fines does it impose for usury?

Mr. GILLESPIE. I will state to the gentleman that there ought to be a penalty, and it ought to be a crime in every civilized community for a man who collects usury.

Mr. PUJO. It is not the law and has never been the law, and the usual penalty enforced in most of the States of the Union is a forfeiture of the usurious interest.

Mr. KEIFER. It is a forfeiture of all the interest in some States.

Mr. PUJO. Yes; in some States. Therefore I consider, were the gentleman's amendment adopted, it would operate as a standing menace to the national banking institutions and to the investment of their stockholders in this way:

Suppose that at the end of the business day it was ascertained that in the multiplicity of the bank's transactions a customer had borrowed or discounted paper chargeable against the amount he was entitled to obtain—a sum exceeding the limitation. The officers of the bank could be prosecuted and convicted of a misdemeanor upon proof of the fact. It might be in a case of that kind that the sum borrowed in excess of the sum allowed by law was insignificant and trifling, and was readily adjusted when the matter was called to the attention of the borrower. Yet should the arrest of any of the bank's officers have been made for a violation of the statute, the failure of the bank would logically follow, as its depositors would become panic-stricken as soon as it became known that an officer of the Federal Government had apprehended an officer of the bank. And there would be no possibility of explaining so as to prevent a run upon the institution, resulting in disaster and loss to the stockholders and in injury to the community.

Again, the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas would, in my judgment, gradually undermine and destroy the confidence now reposed in such institutions in every State in the Union, for this reason:

As a general thing we usually find men of recognized character and business standing acting as presidents, directors, and cashiers of banks in which they are interested. The capital stock in the smaller banks throughout the States, and there are many in the South, is generally owned and held by the people of the community where the banks are located. Should the amendment under discussion be enacted into law many of the officers of these banks in the smaller cities and towns would sever their connection with them and probably dispose of their stock, as they would not be willing to run the risk of arrest and punishment for the possible heedless act of an employee in the institution in lending to some entirely solvent individual an amount in excess of that authorized by law.

When, Mr. Speaker, the national-banking system went into effect by the legislation of 1863, it was not perhaps foreseen that in less than half a century thereafter the banks' resources would aggregate $8,000,000,000 and their individual deposits would exceed $4,000,000,000. Hence it seems to appeal to reason that the limitation that no one individual should borrow more than 10 per cent of the capital should be extended.

The national-banking law provides that the surplus becomes a part of the capital of the bank, and many banking institutions claim that under the present law they have the right to lend 10 per cent of the capital and 10 per cent of the surplus to one individual borrower. But the Comptroller of the Currency holds otherwise, and the adoption of the present bill will place this question beyond the domain of dispute.

In the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, dated December 4, 1905, we find the following interesting paragraph:

Of the 7,966 national banks which have been organized, 460 have failed, or 5¼ per cent of the whole number, as against about 17¼ per cent of banks other than national in the same period. The national banks which have failed have paid their creditors about 78 per cent of the amount due them, while the other banks have paid only about 45 per cent.

It is therefore obvious that, notwithstanding the criticism leveled against the national-banking institutions in the past for lending more than the 10 per cent to individual borrowers, the depositors in such institutions have suffered less than those in other banks.

The Members of the House will note that under the provisions of this measure there is no encouragement for the organization of banks with small capital and a large paid-in surplus to avail themselves of the right to loan 10 per cent of the surplus, as the committee has inserted the provision that—

The total liability of any person, company, corporation, or firm * * * shall in no event exceed 20 per cent of the capital stock of the association.

The object of the committee in incorporating this provision was to prevent the incorporation of banks with a small capital stock and a large paid-in surplus, as under such conditions the security of the depositors would be limited to the stockholders' liability, which is "to the extent of the amount of stock owned at par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested."

It is the judgment of the committee reporting this bill that the adoption of the measure would encourage the organization of banks with larger capital stock, so as to accommodate the business demands of customers entitled to accommodation and at the same time comply with the law.

The Comptroller of the Currency, in commenting upon the practices of excess loans by banks, in a few terse sentences analyzes the situation very clearly. In speaking of the penalty authorized by the present law for this practice, he says:

> The chief difficulty with the enforcement of this clause of the bank act is the lack of any reasonable penalty which can be imposed. There is no way to discipline an offender but the general clause authorizing the Comptroller to begin a suit for the forfeiture of the charter of any bank violating any of the provisions of the act. In other words, there is no penalty but death to the corporation for what is alone no more than a serious misdemeanor. The result of this is that in more than forty years no Comptroller has felt justified in invoking such a severe penalty.
> When the loan limit was originally placed at 10 per cent of the capital stock of the banks few banks had any large surplus. It was not expected that new banks then organizing would pay in surplus with their capital, and by many it is claimed that the capital was meant to include surplus, which only differed from it through a bookkeeper's entry, and that this is now the meaning and intent of the law. However that may be, it would seem, if it is safe for a bank with $500,000 capital and no surplus to loan $50,000, it should be safe for one with $250,000 capital and $500,000 surplus to loan as much.
> After much consideration and discussion of this subject with many able and conservative bankers and business men the Comptroller is satisfied that this is a reasonable view of it, and that banks may safely loan 10 per cent of their unimpaired capital and surplus, and would recommend that the law be amended to that effect.

Mr. Speaker, there is nothing political in this legislation. It is not a partisan measure. I believe it to be in the interest of the public generally, and that its adoption will redound to the benefit of all business. Should it become a law, we have every reason to believe that it will be observed by the banking institutions of the country, and should it prove otherwise, we have a right to believe and expect that the Comptroller of the Currency will, through the proper instrumentalities of the Government, enforce obedience to the statute, close the doors of the institutions violating its provisions, and compel their liquidation and retirement from business. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I believe this bill ought not to pass. Evidently it is suggested by the national banks, and not by the humbler people who borrow from them. Evidently it is in the interest of the large national banks, and not the small ones. It will apply mainly to the great cities, and not to the country. The country banks do not carry any considerable surplus, and the law will have little effect with reference to them.

The policy of permitting banks to loan largely to a single borrower does not tend to the safety of the bank, but tends to endanger those who do business with it and to endanger the institution itself. It is better to have a bank with a large number of small borrowers than a small number of comparatively large borrowers. In that case the losses will be comparatively small instead of comparatively large. The bank, instead of being somewhat crippled at most in the one case, may be destroyed in the other.

Then I can not imagine the reason why, if there is to be a limitation at all, bank officers ought not to be made criminally liable for the violation of the law with reference to it. What can be the objection to that? Here is a bill which permits the loaning of 10 per cent of the capital and 10 per cent of the surplus to one borrower, but no penalty for exceeding that limit. If it is worth while to limit loans at all, whether to 10, 20, or 50 per cent, is it not worth while to enforce observance of the limitation by a penalty? What hardship could it be on the bank officer? He can know just how much is loaned to each borrower, and he knows the amount of the capital of the bank and the amount of the surplus.

If the capital is $100,000 and the surplus $100,000, under the law as it now exists the banker may loan $10,000 to one individual or firm. If this bill passes, the banker could loan $20,000, one-fifth of the capital stock. Now, the bank officer never could be tricked, he never could fall by accident, into the commission of an offense, he never would loan to one individual more than the limit unless he did it consciously and knowingly. He knows to whom the loan is made. He knows how much the loan is; he knows how much the existing loans aggregate, and he knows whether he is going beyond or is keeping himself within the limits of the law. If he wantonly, willfully, purposely goes beyond the limit of the law, why ought he not to be punished for it? If he ought not to be punished for violating that provision of the law, why ought the provision to exist? Why a limit upon loans and no means of enforcing that limit by punishing the man who wantonly—not accidentally, under special circumstances—but wantonly and purposely violates the law? Yet this committee refuses to put in a provision of that kind, refuses to permit such a provision to be put in.

So we find that the committee will increase, for the benefit of the large national banks, the limit of loans to single borrowers to the extent of double what it is now, but they positively refuse to make a single one of the officers of these banks criminally liable for a willful violation of the law. If that is not legislation absolutely in the interest of the big banks and big bank officers and absolutely in disregard of the public and the public interest, I do not know what it is.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHARTEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I believe this bill is directly in the interests of the business of this country. I am confident that it is demanded by the business interests of the country. I do not care so much whether it is or is not desired by the national banks. They can care for themselves, so far as corporate interests are concerned. I know, however, that they do desire its passage, for the reason that at special times they find it necessary to go beyond the statutory limits in order to prevent failures and in order to help and care for their customers. I have never heard of a single letter or a single word of protest coming to the Committee on Banking and Currency from any part of the country against this proposed legislation. It has been suggested and recommended by the Comptrollers of the Currency for many years. It is in the interest, as I said, of doing the business of the country legally and properly. Under these circumstances, as it will tend to furnish an inducement to banks to build up a surplus, and as we have an amendment which prohibits any bank from loaning upon any surplus in excess of 10 per cent of its capital, I can see no reason why the bill should not pass, for I confess I am not one of those who feel like a mad bull when a red flag is shaken before him when anything is said about a national bank. I believe that the national banks of this country have been a great instrument for good and the development of our industries. The gentleman from Texas objects to this bill, as he could not amend it with penalties which, in my judgment, are uncalled for. I am not aware, speaking of penalties, that there is any special limitation or penalty in any State upon a State banking institution loaning beyond 10 per cent. Under these circumstances, I hope the bill will pass. It will aid very much in enabling banks to keep individual loans within the limits prescribed by law, and at the same time furnish necessary accommodations to needy and deserving customers where it can be done with safety, and of the safety and propriety of any loan the directors of the bank are the judges. No legislation attempting to control their action can be effective. The prosperity and solvency of a bank must very largely depend upon the honesty and financial ability of its management, and I unhesitatingly assert that no other corporations controlling such vast interests and such large sums of money are managed with greater fidelity, honesty, and business capacity than national banks.

There are many restrictions upon them now that might be removed. I regret that I have no time to enumerate and consider them.

Mr. SHARTEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, the amount of the capital of national banks to-day is eight hundred and fourteen millions and the surplus and undivided profits about six hundred millions. This bill provides that a bank may loan 10 per cent of its capital and in addition thereto 10 per cent of the surplus equal to its capital. The result will be that the national banks throughout the country will undoubtedly adjust their enormous surpluses where they are in excess of their capital to take advantage of this bill, and it is probable that the loanable funds will be increased by at least $100,000,000. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] stated that he believed it was in the interest of banks and not of the people; that the banks demanded it and not the people; but the banks will make no demands of this character unless they are repeating the demands of their customers. One other point made, as I recall it, by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE] was that when they had once made these loans they could then dissipate the surplus, to which I make answer by quoting the bill, which states that "it shall at no time exceed one-tenth of the capital and one-tenth of the surplus equal to the capital." Therefore there is nothing in the statement made by the gentleman to the effect that once having made the loans they could then dissipate the surplus. I think, Mr. Speaker, there is not one tenable objection to this measure. On the other hand, I believe that this measure should pass for every reason. It has been recommended in substance by every Comptroller from McCulloch, one of the greatest financiers this country ever produced, down to the present Comptroller—Cannon, Hepburn, Lacey, Eckles, Dawes, and Ridgely all approving its general purpose.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill with the amendments reported.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GILLESPIE) there were—ayes 193, noes 7.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays. As many as are in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Six gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused. In the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted for the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, the rules are suspended, and the bill is passed.

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM SACRAMENTO RIVER, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. McKINLAY of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent for the further consideration of the following bill, which the Clerk will report. Without objection, the Clerk will read the amendment by way of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11796) for the diversion of water from the Sacramento River, in the State of California, for irrigation purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Central Canal and Irrigation Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, and its successors, are hereby granted the right to divert, at all seasons of the year, from the Sacramento River, in the State of California, while and so long as such diversion shall not seriously injure the navigation of said river, 900 cubic feet per second of water to be used for irrigating the lands of the Sacramento Valley, on the west side of the Sacramento River, in said State of California. Said water to be diverted from the said Sacramento River on its west bank, between the points on said river known as Swifts Point and Squaw Hill, and the said Central Canal and Irrigation Company is hereby granted the right to erect the necessary works to effectively divert the said water: Provided, That the company shall provide suitable structures for regulating the flow of water from the river into their canals and suitable apparatus for measuring the amount of water taken from the river, and that such structures and apparatus shall be at all times subject to inspection, test, and use by officers or agents of the War Department: And provided further, That the company shall submit for approval of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War plans of its proposed structures for diverting and measuring the water, and until such approval is given the structures shall not be begun: And provided further, That the diversion of water from the river in excess of the quantity herein authorized to be diverted shall be deemed a violation of section 10 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899, and shall subject the company to the penalties prescribed by law for violations of the provisions of said section, and the removal of any structures erected by said company may be enforced as provided in section 12 of the said act: And provided further, That if, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, the amount of water actually diverted shall seriously injure the navigation of the river, the suspension of operations by the said company may be temporarily ordered and enforced by the Secretary of War in such manner and to the extent as may be necessary to preserve the requirements of navigation until such time that the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of California, upon application of any interested party, shall determine the rights as provided by this act; and all rights granted herein and the removal of any of the structures or parts of structures erected under the provisions hereof may be enforced as provided in section 12 of the river and harbor act approved on the 3d day of March, 1899, except that suit for any of the purposes herein named may be instituted by the district attorney of the United States for the northern district of California upon request of the Secretary of War or Chief of Engineers: And provided further, That all costs accruing in any suit or proceeding hereunder shall be borne by the said Central Canal and Irrigation Company, its successors or assigns.

SEC. 2. That in actions against the United States, Secretary of War, or Chief of Engineers, under this act the service of all legal process, including summons, orders, writs of injunction, or restraining orders, shall be upon the United States district attorney for the northern district of California, and when service of said legal process, summons, orders, writs of injunction, or restraining orders is so made as herein provided, the United States, Secretary of War, or Chief of Engineers shall be deemed within the jurisdiction of all courts having jurisdiction herein for all purposes.

SEC. 3. That after fifteen years from the passage of this act the rights hereby granted shall be subject to cancellation by the Secretary of War, without any further act of procedure on the part of the United States, as to such portion of the waters as are not then applied to beneficial use. The said Central Canal and Irrigation Company, its successors or assigns, shall have no claim against the United States for any right so canceled.

SEC. 4. That this act shall be null and void if the actual construction of the structures for diversion and measurement of water herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date hereof.

SEC. 5. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out "of" at end of line 20, page 4, and insert "or."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have some explanation made of the purposes and necessity of the bill.

Mr. McKINLAY of California. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been introduced for the purpose of permitting the Central Irrigation Company of California to take from the Sacramento River 900 cubic feet of water per second at such time as when the taking of that water will not in any way interfere with the navigability of the river. The reason for the introduction of this measure was this: Along in 1897 an irrigation company was formed in the counties of Glenn and Colusa, Cal. They proceeded under what was known as the Wright law, a law passed for the purpose of giving persons who so desired the right to organize an irrigation district. At that time the Federal Government had not assumed jurisdiction over the Sacramento River. Subsequently they have taken that jurisdiction. When the irrigation district was formed all the requirements of the California law were complied with. The people upon that land assessed themselves to an amount of more than $1,000,000 to build ditches and canals. Hard times came on in 1892 and 1893, and money was hard to raise and the work lapsed. Finally the Federal Government assumed jurisdiction over the portion of the river through which this water was designed to be taken. There are some twelve hundred people upon the land which is designed to be irrigated, and the quantity of land is in the neighborhood of 200,000 acres. The soil has become sterile in the last few years, and it is not now as available or valuable as it was for the purpose of raising grain, but they found if they can get water upon it alfalfa and fruits and other products can be raised at a profit. The irrigation district stood in this condition until two or three years ago. The people had expended their money, bonds were out against the district, which bonds were declared void, and a great debt hung against the district. Finally they induced capitalists to advance some three or four hundred thousand dollars, necessary for completing the canal. They gave these capitalists—or, rather, made a contract with them, that they would turn over their work to them for fifty years, provided the capitalists would put water into the ditches and give that water to the farmers at the rate of $1 per year per acre. This contract is entered into.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does this bill recognize that contract?

Mr. McKINLAY of California. Well, the contract is not alluded to in the bill, but the bill was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the committee objected to it and it was referred by them to the War Department, and this bill is virtually a substitute for the original bill drawn by the engineers of the War Department. It has been acquiesced in by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. It has been submitted to the Reclamation Service, and I presume there is no bill to-day before the House that has had so many trials and vicissitudes as this, and it now comes unanimously recommended from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, approved by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, had the approbation of the Reclamation Service and the War Department. Every safeguard has been put around that company, so that the rights of navigation will be protected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. To save the time of the House, as far as I am concerned the gentleman has perfectly satisfied me.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. McKINLAY of California. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The question I desire to ask is this, whether or not this bill has been submitted to the Reclamation Service, to Mr. Newell.

Mr. McKINLAY of California. One section of it has been submitted by the Reclamation Service.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then do I understand the gentleman to state this bill has been recommended by the Reclamation Service?

Mr. McKINLAY of California. It has been passed upon by them and agreed to by them.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is there any prior appropriation of the water in this river?

Mr. McKINLAY of California. No.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Would it interfere with the rights of any other person desiring to use water for irrigation purposes?

Mr. McKINLAY of California. Not at all; water can not be taken out of the river when the river is within 2 feet of low-water mark, and the right to take water is subject always to the discretion of the engineers of the War Department. There are times when that river carries 150,000 cubic feet of water per second, and there are times when there are only 5,000 cubic feet. It is designed to take the water from the river when it is at flood tide and store it and hold it in the reservoir and use it during the time of scarcity in the summer.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is there a diversion dam at this point?

Mr. McKINLAY of California. No dam, but works.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the water used directly from the river?

Mr. McKINLAY of California. Directly from the river.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I would like a couple of minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks two minutes in which to address the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to this bill. From the information that the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has given me I think the bill now before the House is a very good one and that it ought to pass. In fact, I want to say that I am in favor of the policy of irrigation—a policy which has made the deserts of the West and the Pacific blossom like a rose. I am a friend of the Pacific coast, and in the future as in the past I will do all in my power to advance its interests.

I rise for the purpose now, Mr. Speaker, of asking unanimous consent to print, in connection with my remarks, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some data which has been handed to me by Mrs. A. S. Gitterman, a member of the committee on school reorganization of the District of Columbia, regarding a bill now pending before the Committee on the District of Columbia, known as H. R. 8472, concerning the public schools and free lectures in the District of Columbia. It is a matter of some moment. I take a very deep interest in this question, and I know that the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia will be glad to have the information these worthy and patriotic and self-sacrificing ladies have collected regarding this subject. The bill will come up before the Committee on the District of Columbia next Thursday for a hearing. The data to which I have referred is very short and will not take up much space in the RECORD. It is important to all the Members of the House and in my judgment should be placed before them as a matter of information. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print it with my remarks on this matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to printing in the RECORD the matter referred to by the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, just a word to say that I thank the House in the name of these distinguished ladies for the courtesy it has granted me. I take a deep and an abiding interest in the good and lasting and beneficial work these far-seeing women are doing for the children in the capital of our country. These women deserve the praise and the commendation of all good citizens. No one can estimate the importance of their work. They are building for themselves in the hearts of humanity a monument more enduring than marble or brass. Whatever they say or desire in connection with this subject should command our earnest personal consideration. I am in favor of all they request, and I know if we meet their expectations we will make no mistake. I have had some experience with this subject. But more about this question when the bill comes before the House. Suffice it now for me to say that years ago, when I was a member of the legislature of the State of New York, I passed a bill for free lectures in that State, and I am glad to say that the benefits of that law to the people of my State are beyond the calculation of the ordinary mind. Thousands and thousands of people are being educated to-day in the State of New York through the agency of these free-lecture courses. Their extension means more knowledge, and I am with the patriotic women of the District of Columbia in their efforts to extend it here and elsewhere in our country.

Mr. Speaker, the data I wish printed in the RECORD is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 16, 1906.

GENTLEMEN: The committee on school reorganization of the Public Education Association has had the Babcock bill, as printed for the committee, under advisement and respectfully suggests the following slight, but essential, amendments to H. R. 8472.

1. Board of examiners.—Page 8, lines 3 and 4, of H. R. 8472: Examinations should not be set by the power that appoints, but by a board of examiners. As it stands now, it is opposed to civil-service spirit. The danger is that examinations will be fixed to suit special applicants. (See report of hearings before the subcommittee, p. 336, lines 3–23; p. 338, lines 52–56.)

2. Directory of teachers.—Provision should be made for the publication semiannually of a directory of the teachers of the public schools, giving name, address, date of appointment, salary, and school to which assigned. (See hearings, p. 411, lines 6–22; p. 410, lines 12–53.)

3. Free lectures.—The committee is surprised to notice that provision for the department of free lectures has been omitted, despite the expressed approval on page 393 of the hearings, lines 1 to 6, and despite the past two years' popular success shown on same page, lines 15 to 20. We therefore respectfully petition that section 6 of H. R. 12591, in some form or other, be inserted into the Babcock bill. We append on the last page of these suggestions some citations from the hearings and references thereto bearing on this important subject. (See hearings, p. 72, lines 19–43; p. 358, lines 6–18; p. 225, lines 14–32; pp. 329–331; pp. 204–208; pp. 392–403; p. 204, lines 24–36; p. 396, lines 15–43.)

4. Assistant superintendents.—(a) Section 9, page 10, of H. R. 8472, "Cost of supervision:" White schools—White superintendent, $5,000; white assistant superintendent, $3,600; white supervisor of high schools, $2,200, and clerks; colored superintendent, $3,600, and not a clerk nor a stenographer nor a messenger; he should be provided with at least a clerk, for the bill proposes to make the colored assistant superintendent an executive officer, having sole charge of the colored normal, high, and graded schools.

(b) Line 21, page 2, of H. R. 8472, add the words "or in the case of colored teachers, upon the written recommendation of the colored assistant superintendent."

(c) Page 3, line 13, of H. R. 8472—the colored assistant superintendent should have a seat in the board, but not the right to vote. After the word "He," insert the words "together with the colored assistant superintendent."

(d) Page 11, line 23, of H. R. 8472, insert the words "the colored assistant superintendent" after the word "schools."

5. Assistants to superintendent of buildings and supplies.—Page 4, line 12, of H. R. 8472, add the words "upon the recommendation of the superintendent of buildings and supplies;" because he is financially responsible for his supply clerk. One assistant in his office should be colored.

6. School nurses.—Page 11, line 17, of H. R. 8472, strike out the words "or matrons;" insert the word "graduated" before the word "nurses." Nine hundred dollars apiece for mere matron service would be unnecessary and extravagant. (See hearings, p. 403, lines 27–58; entire page 404; p. 405, lines 1–42.)

We desire respectfully to express our appreciation and gratification at the fact that the House of Representatives Committee on the District of Columbia saw fit to incorporate as amendments to the Commissioners' bill nearly every recommendation and suggestion for the reform and improvement of the public schools of Washington, which the Public Education Association of Washington brought to its attention and recommended during the hearings before the subcommittee on the several school bills.

Citations and references concerning free lectures.

Congressman JOSEPH A. GOULDEN: "I know whereof I speak when I say there is no department of our educational system [in New York] that meets with so much favor with the people as our free lecture course, and I hope it has come to stay in the city of Washington. I should regret exceedingly to see the board of education here take a step backward in this direction." (School hearings, p. 72.)

Mr. H. R. Fuller, labor representative: "I speak in a general way. We approve this proposition [section 6, H. R. 12591, providing for free lectures], because we believe it gives workingmen who are engaged throughout the day an opportunity to enlighten themselves through these lectures, and I simply wanted to add the hearty approval of the men whom I represent to that provision of the bill." (School hearings, p. 358.)

Mr. Shelby J. Davidson, colored lawyer: "Most of them [the colored people] are breadwinners; most of them are toilers by day; most of them have come up through conditions which have made it impossible for them to gain the elementary education which is to fit them for the struggle of life, so that you can see that the free lecture courses, giving them the advantages of those learned lecturers, those persons who are in their lines experts, will broaden their minds; it will give them advantages to carry to their children, and that is the principal point after all. We believe that an extension of the free lecture courses, especially in and among the colored people, an extension of the night school courses, if it can not be done by day, will be a blessing to us; it will lessen the great charge of criminality among the colored people and give them something to think of and act upon, and will rid you of your fighters and criminals and that class that makes the District possibly objectionable on account of its negro element, so called." (School hearings, p. 225.)

Mrs. R. S. Morton, M. D., a southern physician of much experience in Washington: "I was living in Washington at the time that this system was introduced here by Mrs. Gitterman, and was particularly delighted to know that it would be in vogue here, because I felt that having been successful in New York it would be equally so here under her able guidance. The reports at the end of the first year were very gratifying, in showing that the success here had been even greater than that in New York the first year." (School hearings, page 329.)

Popular success of the free lectures: "Much expense of administration was met privately and the work of general supervision was volunteered, so that the specific Congressional appropriation of $1,500 was able to supply lectures for 15,788 persons, or about one-fortieth of the entire population of the District of Columbia, at an annual cost of less than 10 cents per capita. The results are gratifying, as evinced by numerous letters from pleased members among the auditors." (School hearings, page 393.) Also some of the letters here referred to are on file with the subcommittee.

Rev. Lewis B. Moore, Ph. D., dean of teachers' college, Howard University: "The majority of people can not go to school; they must be breadwinners; they ought to get some education. Free lectures are a splendid thing; they ought to be multiplied. We have had a few of them. There ought to be a regularly organized system of free lectures, with a supervisor, somebody to look after them. It is as important as any other part of the school system." (School hearings, page 204.)

Lectures an education for adults: "What the public school is to the child the free-lecture system is the adult workingman and working woman. * * * It is not too much to ask of any truly popular system of education that it should hold out to these intellectually starved people some small extension of the public school education; that it should at least feed their hunger, as it were, by the crumbs that fall from their children's table." (School hearings, page 257.)

Educational development of free lectures under volunteer expert guidance: "The bill provides no salary for the supervisor, because one of the many public-spirited services to this community of the Public Education Association of Washington during the past two years has been to give the services of one of its officers to this work, which has been so successful as to suggest the wisdom of continuing it under the same generous and educated guidance. The duties prescribed for the unpaid supervisor of lectures are the same as those prescribed in the New York school law for the same office." (Congressman J. A. GOULDEN, school hearings, p. 72.) "What they [the workingmen] wanted was not amusement, but instruction; and I would like to make just as strong and and just as clear as I can that if there is no other way—and there probably is not, that I can see—to give them what they want than the way which the wisdom of Mr. GOULDEN has embodied in section 6 of his bill, No. 12591, then keep under the Public Education Association, which is so anxious to develop education in common [cooperation] with the board of education, the development of those lecture courses while they are in their initial stages. I do beg of this committee with all the force I can, and plead for it very, very earnestly, that section 6 may be passed." (School hearings, page 396.)

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKINLAY] for unanimous consent to consider the bill H. R. 11796?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MCKINLAY of California, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DENATURED ALCOHOL.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from further consideration of the bill H. R. 17453 and pass the same with the amendments recommended by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] moves to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from further consideration of the bill indicated, agreeing to the amendments, and passing the bill. The Clerk will report the bill as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17453) for the withdrawal from bond, tax free, of domestic alcohol when rendered unfit for beverage or liquid medicinal uses by mixture with suitable denaturing materials.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after three months from the passage of this act domestic alcohol of such degree of proof as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, may be withdrawn from bond without the payment of internal-revenue tax, for use in the arts and industries, and for fuel, light, and power, provided said alcohol shall have been mixed in the presence and under the direction of an authorized Government officer, before withdrawal from the bonded warehouse, with denaturing material suitable to the use for which the alcohol is withdrawn, but which destroys its character as a beverage and renders it unfit for liquid medicinal purposes.

The character and quantity of the said denaturing material and the conditions upon which said alcohol may be withdrawn free of tax shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who shall, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, make all necessary regulations for carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

Distillers, manufacturers, dealers, and all other persons furnishing, handling, or using alcohol withdrawn from bond under the provisions of this act shall keep such books and records, execute such bonds, and render such returns as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation require. Such books and records shall be open at all times to the inspection of any internal-revenue officer or agent.

SEC. 2. That any person who uses alcohol withdrawn from bond under the provisions of section 1 of this act for manufacturing any beverage or liquid medicinal preparation, or knowingly sells any beverage or liquid medicinal preparation made in whole or in part from such alcohol, or knowingly violates any of the provisions of this act, or who shall recover or attempt to recover by redistillation or by any other process or means, any alcohol rendered unfit for beverage or liquid medicinal purposes under the provisions of this act, or who knowingly uses, sells, or conceals alcohol so recovered or redistilled, shall on conviction of each offense be fined not more than $5,000, or be imprisoned not more than five years, or both: Provided, That manufacturers employing processes in which alcohol, used free of tax under the provisions of this act, is expressed or evaporated from the articles manufactured shall be permitted to recover such alcohol and to have such alcohol restored to a condition suitable solely for reuse in manufacturing processes under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe.

SEC. 3. That for the employment of such additional force of chemists, internal-revenue agents, inspectors, deputy collectors, clerks, laborers, and other assistants as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may deem proper and necessary to the prompt and efficient operation and enforcement of this law, and for the purchase of locks, seals, weighing beams, gauging instruments, and for all necessary expenses incident to the proper execution of this law, the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as may be required, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

For a period of two years from and after the passage of this act the force authorized by this section of this act shall be appointed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and without compliance with the conditions prescribed by the act entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service," approved January 16, 1883, and amendments thereof, and with such compensation as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may fix, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] to twenty minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to provide alcohol free of tax to use for manufacturing, lighting, heating, and power purposes; that the alcohol when withdrawn from bond shall be denatured in such manner as the Commissioner shall prescribe, so as to render it unfit for and destroy its quality as a beverage or to be used in liquid medicine. Every country that imposes a tax upon alcohol has now free alcohol in the arts except the United States. The question has been agitated here for a good many years, and considerable attention has been given to it.

In 1897 an able commission was appointed by Congress that went into this subject very fully. At that time the idea was to furnish free alcohol for every use in the arts, including medicinal purposes, and the majority of that committee very properly came to the conclusion that such use of it could not be had without defrauding the revenue. In later years the idea has grown up of limiting its use so that it could not be used for medicinal purposes, and medical purposes in later years has gotten to mean for beverage purposes in very many localities in the United States; so the committee have entirely eliminated such use as that by providing for denaturing the alcohol in such a way that it would be poisonous if taken internally or used as a medicine.

I want to say further in reference to that, the commission found that there would be a large loss of revenue, amounting to nine or ten million dollars. This was founded on the statement of the census of 1890, that about 9,000,000 gallons of ethyl alcohol were used in manufactures and arts at that time. I suppose that included the use for medicinal purposes as well, and that would entail a loss of ten or eleven millions of revenue. Since that time the manufacture of wood alcohol has increased in this country to such a degree that last year 7,500,000 gallons of wood alcohol were manufactured. It seems that wood alcohol has been substituted for manufacturing purposes almost entirely in this country. It is used for manufacturing formaldehyde, and the ethyl alcohol will not produce formaldehyde, and a million and more gallons is used every year for that purpose, and will continue to be used under the provisions of this bill. More than a million of gallons are exported. About 5,000,000 gallons are used in manufactures. These 5,000,000 gallons will undoubtedly be displaced by ethyl alcohol in the event of the passage of this bill, because ethyl alcohol untaxed is cheaper, and it is also free from complaint that has come to the committee of the unhealthful use of wood alcohol in manufactures. Sometimes it destroys the eyesight and sometimes destroys life. A great demand, likely to arise for the use of this denatured alcohol, is to be found in fuel, lighting, and heating purposes. In Germany the demand has so increased in the last four or five years that it is believed 65,000,000 gallons of alcohol will be used for these purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has consumed his five minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. I will yield myself three minutes more.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PAYNE. I have not time.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. You have twenty minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. I regret that I have to decline, but I have promised my time. The gentleman will permit me to continue. Now, of course, the demand for this is not so great for manufacturing purposes. If that were so, I have reason to doubt whether the committee would have recommended this bill; but it seems that we can produce alcohol in many parts of the country at a price so low that it will take the place of gasoline to run motor engines, of which 300,000 are now used in this country, and to which they are adding 100,000 a year. It can be used instead of kerosene for lighting purposes, as a gallon of alcohol will burn twice as long as a gallon of kerosene by actual test, furnishing the same candlepower in the light; and if produced cheap enough, can be used for fuel in some parts of the country remote from fuel sources; and it is for this reason and by reason of the probable use of alcohol in these industries and for these domestic purposes the committee has recommended this bill.

We are not oblivious to the fact that the passage of this bill will injure for a time the wood-alcohol interests; but we do not believe it will injure them permanently. We believe in the end it will result in good, because we believe there will be such use of ethyl alcohol denatured by wood alcohol that it will in the end benefit the wood-alcohol interest. I append the report as a part of my remarks.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 17453) for the withdrawal from bond, tax free, of domestic alcohol when rendered unfit for beverage or liquid medicinal uses by mixture with suitable denaturing materials, having had the same under consideration, report it back without amendment, with a recommendation that the bill do pass.

This bill provides that three months after its passage domestic alcohol of such degree of proof, and under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe, may be withdrawn without the payment of internal-revenue tax, for use in the arts and industries, and for fuel, light, and power. The bill also provides that the same shall be denatured so as to destroy its character as a beverage and render it unfit for liquid medicinal purposes. The second section prescribes proper penalties for the enforcement of the law. The third section provides for an additional force of chenfists, internal-revenue agents, inspectors, etc., to carry out the provisions of the law.

The subject of tax-free alcohol for use in the arts has at different periods demanded the attention of Congress. All other nations impose a tax upon alcohol, and other commercial nations of importance, having imposed such a tax for a series of years, have allowed the use of tax-free alcohol in the arts and industries. The United States have hesitated to enter upon this course for various reasons. On acount of the high tax there is the temptation to attempt fraud upon the revenue; the fear of the successful practice of such fraud has been the main obstacle to the enactment of any such legislation.

This fear was the chief reason for the adverse report of the Commission appointed in 1897, which examined so thoroughly into this subject, and was the ground on which Secretary Carlisle failed to provide suitable rules and regulations to carry out the clause in the Wilson bill in 1894 which provided for free alcohol in the arts under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury might prescribe. The question hitherto has been mixed up with the idea of free alcohol for use in medicines. In fact, up to a recent date, the chief agitation has been in behalf of the druggists and the manufacturers of medicines throughout the country. It might be impossible to properly guard the revenue if alcohol was to go tax free for use in medicinal compounds.

It is for this reason that the committee has eliminated the use of tax-free alcohol in the compounding of medicines in the bill reported. We provide that it must be denatured in the presence of the internal-revenue officers before it can be withdrawn from bond. Although the denaturing material is not mentioned in the bill and is left in the discretion of the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, wood alcohol would be the most natural material for the purpose of denaturing. This is the most common denaturing agency employed in other countries, and as it is produced so abundantly here there is no question but that it would be used by our revenue officers.

The civilized countries which allow free alcohol methylated have found no difficulty in protecting the revenue against fraud. This is the common experience of all these countries. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue both agree that in the enforcement of this bill fraud could be practically eliminated. We now allow the makers of wine to use 3,500,000 gallons of free alcohol to fortify the wine, and we allow free alcohol in the making of vinegar. The Commissioner reports that there is practically no fraud under either of these exemptions from tax.

Another objection to the enactment of this legislation hitherto has been the question of loss of revenue. There has been no attempt to get at the amount of ethyl (grain) alcohol used in the arts and industries since 1890. In the census of that date it was reported and estimated at about 9,000,000 gallons. It is understood that this included the use of it for medicinal purposes. The use of methyl (wood) alcohol was very small in 1890, less than a million gallons per annum. Since that date the method of manufacture of methyl alcohol has been greatly improved, and the annual output has increased, so that in 1905 it reached about 7,500,000 gallons.

Of this amount over a million gallons were exported, leaving something over 6,000,000 gallons for consumption in this country. It is found that methyl alcohol has supplanted ethyl alcohol for use in nearly every art and industry except in medicinal preparations. Some of those who appeared before the committee favoring the bill made careful estimates to show that the loss in revenue from the alcohol now used in such arts and industries would not exceed one-half million dollars, while the gentlemen who appeared in behalf of the wood-alcohol industry agreed that the loss of revenue from this source would be substantially nothing. The objection, then, on account of the loss of the revenue seems to have been fully overcome.

Since 1890 the wood-alcohol industry has steadily advanced on account of the increasing demand for the use of a cheaper alcohol than tax-paid grain alcohol in the arts and industries. From year to year a better article has been put upon the market, and, as stated above, the wood alcohol has substantially displaced grain alcohol in the arts and industries. While this is a by-product, it would appear that about 40 per cent of the income from the manufacture of charcoal is represented by wood alcohol, the other 60 per cent representing charcoal and acetate of lime produced by the same process.

Of course the people who went into this industry have anticipated that the time would come when grain alcohol would be free in the arts and industries in this country, the same as in the other commercial countries of the world. There is no doubt but that the enactment of this bill into law would temporarily injure the wood-alcohol industry. There are some industries that would still continue to use wood alcohol in preference to grain alcohol, to the extent probably of 1,000,000 gallons, and these, with the export, would still leave at least 5,000,000 gallons of the output of the factories to find a market in the United States. Great Britain uses 10 per cent of wood alcohol for denaturing purposes.

Germany uses but 2½ per cent mixed with other denaturents. It would seem that for nearly all the industries in the United States the proper and best denaturing material would be wood alcohol. If the anticipation of some of the advocates of the tax-free alcohol were to be realized, but little time would elapse before the entire output of the methyl alcohol factories would be used as a denaturing material.

But the better opinion is that it would take considerable time to effect this change, and until that result was realized the charcoal manufacturers would have to look for their profits to the product of charcoal and acetate of lime, both of which are in demand to the full extent of these factories. While this would cut down the very large dividends reported to have been paid hitherto in the wood-alcohol business, it is not believed it would destroy or permanently cripple the industry.

But in the change of this tax law we have to consider the greatest good to the greatest number. If it was an assured fact that the only result of this legislation would be to allow the manufacturers now using wood alcohol a cheaper material for the 6,000,000 or 7,000,000 gallons which they use, the legislation, in view of the injury to the wood-alcohol industry, could not be justified. In the judgment of the committee the result of this legislation would be to very widely extend the use of alcohol. According to the latest reports the use of alcohol for manufacturing purposes has greatly multiplied in Germany in the last few years, as will appear from the following report:

Consumption of untaxed industrial alcohol in Germany.

Fiscal year ending October 1—	Hectoliters of pure or absolute alcohol.	Quantities expressed in American proof or taxable gallons.
1900	1,047,417	55,393,617
1901	1,161,326	61,318,032
1902	1,114,230	58,831,344
1903	1,289,123	68,065,624
1904	1,394,607	73,655,249

The hectoliter is equal to 26.4 American wine gallons. In Germany the unit of tax is a liter of pure or absolute alcohol, and therefore the number of wine gallons of alcohol used for manufacturing and other industrial purposes must be multiplied by 2 to express the quantity in American proof gallons.

Ten per cent on the average consumption in Germany for denaturing purposes would use the entire wood alcohol product in this country. The Germans have led in the manufacture of coal-tar preparations and aniline dyes to a great extent because of the opportunity for using free alcohol in their manufacture. While it is true that Germany may lead the world in chemistry, this fact alone would not account for their discoveries in this direction.

Methyl alcohol is now employed in this country in the manufacture of the foregoing list of articles: Aniline colors and dyes, hats (stiff, silk, and straw), electrical apparatus, transparent soap, furniture, picture moldings, burial caskets, cabinet work, passenger cars, pianos, organs, whips, toys, rattan goods, lead pencils, brushes, wagons, boots and shoes, smokeless powder, fulminate of mercury, brass beds, gas and and electric light fixtures, various kinds of metal hardware, incandescent mantles, photographic materials, celluloid and other like compounds, sulphuric ether, organic chemicals.

It is believed that it would be displaced by the use of tax-free denatured ethyl alcohol, except when used in manufactures where it is essential, and where ethyl alcohol can not be used. The amount of methyl alcohol which can not for this reason be displaced is about 1,000,000 gallons.

The bulk of free denatured alcohol in Germany is used for the purpose of light, fuel, and heat. A lamp is now made with a Welsbach mantle which produces a very strong, steady, and high-grade light by the use of alcohol. Experiments have been made testing this lamp with the most improved pattern kerosene lamps with round wicks and of equal candlepower; it was found that a gallon of alcohol would keep the alcohol lamp burning twice as many hours as would a gallon of kerosene burning in the most approved pattern of kerosene lamp which is in general use. In other words, 1 gallon of alcohol is equal to 2 gallons of kerosene for lighting purposes. Hence, it follows if the price of alcohol methylated is less than double the price of kerosene its use, especially on the farms and in the villages of the country, would become enormous.

During the past few months experiments have been made in adapting gasoline power engines to the use of alcohol. This has been successfully done in Germany for several years, though there they generally mix 25 per cent of gasoline with the alcohol to obtain a more ready ignition of the fluid, which is forced into the cylinder of the engine in the form of vapor. Experiments in this country have developed the fact that alcohol can be used just as readily as this mixture with gasoline or the gasoline itself, and the operation of the engine with its use is perfect. The use of small motor engines running with gasoline has become very large. In the estimate before the committee it would appear that 300,000 of these engines were now in use and that the annual output is more than a hundred thousand.

These engines are especially adapted to farm use for pumping water, cutting feed, filling silos, thrashing grain, and the multiplied uses to which a stationary power on a farm is adapted. The principal objection to gasoline, aside from its cost, is the danger to the farm buildings from fire. A gasoline fire can not be quenched with water. On the other hand, water seems to scatter the gasoline and increases the danger. But an alcohol fire is easily put out by the use of water. Large numbers of these motors are also used in automobiles, the number of which is increasing with wonderful rapidity, and for motors in small boats.

The one question of substitution of alcohol in great part for gasoline is that of cost. There is another question of the future supply of gasoline equal to the growing demand. The supply is limited. The demand seems to be almost unlimited. Experiments show that a gallon of alcohol will produce at least 10 per cent more power that a gallon of gasoline. The alcohol for this purpose produces the best results when there is at least 10 per cent of water in the mixture, or, in other words, when the alcohol is 90 per cent pure. This is known as 180° alcohol.

There is a considerable use of alcohol in Germany for heat, substituting it in stoves for gasoline. If the alcohol can be produced at an economical cost, there is no question but, like the use of gas stoves in cities, the use of alcohol stoves in the country would grow to large proportions.

The principal question, therefore, is the question of the cost of production of alcohol as compared with the cost of production of kerosene and gasoline. Upon this subject there was a wide range of evidence before the committee. It appeared that the market price of ethyl alcohol, eliminating the tax, is now about 38 cents a gallon; that during the past year it has been sold as low as 25 cents or less. It is understood that this price was by the barrel.

Mr. W. E. Lummus, who appeared in opposition to the legislation, furnished an estimate of the cost of 95 per cent alcohol, which is 5 per cent above the purity required for motor purposes, showing 27.75 cents per gallon. In this, however, he figures the cost of corn at 46.6 cents per bushel, and the manufacturer's expenses at 12.85 cents per gallon. As corn has averaged for the last ten years 42.36 cents per bushel, and the cost of manufacturing for ten years in the distillery at Peoria was 3.4 cents per gallon, it is quite evident that these figures are greatly exaggerated.

The best test before the committee would seem to be that obtained from the books of a large distillery in Peoria, Ill. At this distillery the record for ten years showed an average cost of 42.36 cents per bushel for the corn used. The average production of alcohol was 4.76 proof gallons from a bushel of corn. The cost averaged 10.78 cents per proof gallon of alcohol. The corn used in making one gallon of proof alcohol was 0.21 of a bushel, costing 8.89 cents; deducting this cost from 10.78 cents, the total cost of the alcohol, we have 1.89 cents as the cost of making one gallon of proof alcohol over and above the cost of the grain. For 90 per cent alcohol the cost of making would be 3.4 cents per wine gallon.

It should be noted here that the improvements in distilling have increased the yield to 5 gallons of proof alcohol per bushel of corn. With corn at this price, the cost of production for the entire period was 10.78 cents per proof gallon, or 19.4 cents per wine gallon testing 90 per cent, but this was on an average of 4.76 proof gallons for a bushel of corn. With an average of 5 proof gallons per bushel, which is at present realized, the cost would be about 18.4 cents per wine gallon. The cost of manufacture of crude wood alcohol, according to the census reports, is 40 cents per gallon. Using 10 per cent with 18.4 cent alcohol, the cost of denaturized alcohol would be 20.5 cents per gallon. This is less than the cost of gasoline at points in the Northwest represented before the committee for instance, by Mr. MARSHALL, of North Dakota, and would bring alcohol even at this price of corn in equal competition with gasoline.

But Mr. MARSHALL reports the price of corn at this point at 30 cents per bushel. At this price for corn, 90 per cent denatured alcohol would cost 14.20 cents a gallon. The cost of distribution would be much lighter, the consumer being so near the factory, and would indicate a price at that point below the price of gasoline. Representative MARSHALL tells us that kerosene oil costs 18 cents in Dakota and gasoline 22. Surely there can be no question as to the greater economy in the use of alcohol in that section of the country. Corn seems to be the best material from which to make alcohol in this country for beverage purposes, as is proven by the fact that it is nearly the only material used now in its manufacture in this country. In Europe the principal material is the potato, but there they have no corn.

There is another material used in the manufacture of alcohol which is much cheaper than corn and is not used now because of the odor which follows the alcohol and renders it unfit for beverage purposes. This is molasses of the lowest quality. This material is well described by Mr. Lummus in the following language:

"As is well known, millions of gallons of base molasses are produced in all the Central and South American countries and the West Indies, which is now largely burned, fed to animals, or destroyed, although a portion is dumped on our shores at almost any price above freight, and at New Orleans, Boston, and Brooklyn is being worked up into inferior liquors. That it is not more generally used at present is due to the fact that alcohol made from molasses has a disagreeable odor and taste, which render it less acceptable for the chief purpose for which ethyl alcohol is now employed in the United States, namely, liquors and medicines.

"For industrial purposes, however, especially where repulsive denaturants are to be employed, the odor and taste of molasses alcohol are not a defect, and should the tax-free law open an avenue to its more extensive use it is difficult to see how any other material could be considered for the manufacture of industrial alcohol."

It is this material which is now being used in Cuba, where Minister Squires and other United States officials report that alcohol is being manufactured at a cost of 10 cents a gallon. Two gallons of this molasses will make a gallon or more of 90 per cent alcohol. This molasses is dumped into various ports of the United States, at New Orleans, New York, and Boston, at a cost at these ports of 3 cents a gallon. Mr. Lummus estimates the cost of making at 9 cents, but the actual basis of cost for ten years in making corn alcohol in Peoria, as appears from the books of the distillery, is 3.4 cents for 90 per cent alcohol. This would result in the production of alcohol at 9.4 cents per gallon in the eastern markets.

A similar grade of molasses is produced in the manufacture of sugar beets. Ten of the factories in Michigan send their product to a distillery in that State and, as appeared in the Philippine hearings before this committee, produce therefrom about a million gallons of proof alcohol. Should the beet sugar develop as its friends anticipate, a large supply of this material would be found in the Northwestern States, where the price of kerosene and gasoline is exceptionally high. Unquestionably this would supply a market for the by-product in the manufacture of beet sugar which generally goes to waste, and would prove a potent factor in the development of that industry. If even the figures of Mr. Lummus are correct, and they are obviously too high, this source of supply would seem to settle the question of the economy in the use of alcohol.

Alcohol would be able to supplant gasoline and kerosene in the production of power and light and great good would result, especially to the farmers of the United States. It seemed reasonable that this result would follow, and, with the resulting good to the great mass of our people, would far outweigh the temporary loss which would come to the wood-alcohol industry. This belief is shared by the great mass of our fellow-citizens from all parts of the United States, and the demand for tax-free denatured alcohol is well-nigh universal.)

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, no one can be more fully sensible of the impossibility of preventing the passage of the pending measure through this House than I am. The unanimity with which it will be supported is, in my judgment, but a measure of the misinformation, false hopes, and abounding optimism which prevail, not only in this House but throughout the country, upon this subject.

But I would be false to my duty did I not at least protest against the passage of a measure which I believe will not only disappoint the hopes of those who favor it, but will seriously cripple, if not destroy, the wood-alcohol business and its allied industries, which in my district alone support not less than 15,000 people and employ nearly $20,000,000 of capital.

In that section of our country, as in many others, are large areas of timbered lands. Some of this timber is fit for manufacture into lumber, but trees of that kind are too scattering, and the cost of building roads and lumbering them alone is too great to permit of the business being carried on at a profit. But the present age prospers on what the last age wasted. So the owners of these lands cut them clean. The pine and hemlock and maple timber that is fit to manufacture into lumber is so manufactured. The cedar is made into railroad ties and telegraph poles and fence posts, and the waste timber, the partly decayed, the tops, the crooked pieces, and all it will not pay to make into lumber is cut into cordwood and at the kilns converted into wood alcohol and charcoal and acetate of lime, and then the charcoal is used at the furnace near the land from which it was produced with which to smelt iron ore into pig iron, and all these varied forms of industry are carried on together as one business. Each branch of this industry is necessary to the success of the whole. The manufacture of the lumber would be unprofitable if carried on alone. The making of charcoal would be unprofitable if carried on alone. The manufacture of wood alcohol would be prohibitive in its cost if carried on alone, and the manufacture of acetate of lime would be impossible if carried on alone, but each branch of the industry supports the whole until now it employs in my district alone the number of men and the amount of capital I have stated. This is the business this House proposes to wipe off the industrial map in the chimerical hope of making alcohol from potato peelings and cornstalks and any old thing that contains starch or sugar at a price which will permit its use for light and fuel and power and incidentally relieving my friend from Kansas of his task of curbing the Standard Oil Company and cause that corporation and the independent producers of oil to be bundled indiscriminately into the bankruptcy court, while the distillers' trust and the sugar trust and those in this House who hate all trusts will mingle their separate and solemn joys above the dishonored graves of the defunct.

But these gentlemen who are aiming at the Standard Oil Company when they have bagged their game will find that they have brought down only the wood-alcohol business of Pennsylvania, New York, and Michigan. There is, alas, too little doubt about their getting that. The cost of wood alcohol to the manufacturer at the present price of labor is about 50 cents a gallon, and grain alcohol is now selling in the market, with the tax deducted, at about 38 to 40 cents a gallon, and as grain alcohol can be used for all purposes for which wood alcohol is used and can be produced cheaper, it must inevitably drive out the latter.

But it has been asked, Should the Government use its power of internal taxation for the purpose of building up one industry at the expense of another? I answer unhesitatingly, no; but on the other hand it should not abolish taxes already in existence and which are needed for the support of the Government and the building of needed public improvements for the sole and only purpose of destroying an existing industry in order that another by the aid of a bounty from the Government may be built upon its ruins. I have used the term "bounty" advisedly, for that is exactly what this bill proposes. It is to give a bounty, estimated at 5 cents a gallon, on denatured grain alcohol, so that it may be sold at a price to compete with petroleum products. This will be clearer from an examination of the hearings before the committee.

On page 292 Secretary Shaw, speaking of denatured grain alcohol, says:

Now, I want to make this suggestion, Mr. Chairman, if you please. That if you put a small tax upon it, enough to somewhat more than pay the expense of administration—and I suppose everyone will agree that it ought to pay the expense of supervision in that respect.

Oh, yes; all agree to that but the Ways and Means Committee and this House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue thought that 5 cents would be enough.

Secretary SHAW. I was going to say that 5 cents a gallon will possibly cover the loss. I do not think it will more than cover the loss. No one can tell how much will be consumed. But I am going to make this suggestion, that you put on 5 cents a gallon for two years and put it all in one bill, and thereafter let the Secretary of the Treasury assess against the various producing plants such a tax as will pay the administration.

Then the gentleman from Mississippi, after stating that 18¾ cents per gallon was the best price at which it seemed possible to make grain alcohol, said:

It is a very close question even if people can get this commodity without any tax, get it free, whether they will get it cheaply enough to compete with the things that can be used for fuel, light, and power. It is so close a question that it seems to me that 5 cents a gallon added to its cost to the purchaser would exclude it as a competitor with other commodities used in the production of fuel, light, and power.

Again, he adds:

Even at 19 or 20 cents it is questionable whether it will not be too high to compete with some things that are being used. If you make it 25 per cent higher, you are just cutting off its competitive use with kerosene or gasoline or those other things by just that much as a direct agent for fuel, light, and power.

Secretary SHAW. I grant you that the 5 cents tax would be prohibitive on power for two years.

Mr. COCKRAN. You say the 5 cents tax so long as it lasts will practically shut this out as a competitor or competitive agent in producing heat, light, and power?

Secretary SHAW. Yes.

Mr. COCKRAN. That is the main object of it, is it not, to produce a cheap and available agent for the production of heat, light, and power?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That would exclude the farmer from all benefit from it except the little increased sale of his corn.

And Secretary Shaw adds:

It is idle to talk about 50,000,000 gallons (production per annum). Talk rather about 10,000,000 gallons at the end of one or two years.

So the mountain has labored and brought forth this mouse. The 200,000,000 gallons of annual production which so fired the excited imagination of the enthusiastic searchers for this alchemist's secret which was to transmute cornstalks into gold has shrunk to a beggarly, insignificant, miserly, and miserable 10,000,000 gallons—only a little more than enough to take the place of the wood alcohol industry it will destroy.

And it is admitted that there is no hope of greater growth, or even that amount of immediate growth, unless the Government subsidizes this industry by the amount necessary to supervise denaturing the alcohol, which is estimated at 5 cents per gallon. And in order that this may be done the bill appropriates $250,000, equal to 5 cents a gallon on 5,000,000 gallons.

I am surprised at the attitude of the Democracy upon this question. I am little less than amazed that the distinguished gentleman from New York, whose language I have quoted from the hearings and who has so often told us in varied but always eloquent, striking, and brilliant phrase that the Government produced nothing, and therefore had nothing to give; that if it gave to one it must steal from another, and that, therefore, protection was robbery, and who imputes all the corruption that finds its way into our social and political system to this cause from the petty pilfering that at one time invaded our Post-Office Department to what the gentleman from New York might call the sublime larcenies of insurance officials. I am amazed, I say, that he of all men should unite with the gentleman from Mississippi, who told us that protection was a system whereby the many were robbed that some one industry might be hothoused into an unnatural prosperity, and the gentleman from Missouri, whose language about custom-houses I will not quote, because he has become so sensitive about the numerous references thereto upon this floor, but which all remember—that these three gentlemen of all others, I say, should unite in support of this bill, the avowed purpose of which is to hothouse into artificial prosperity the alcohol business by the aid of a subsidy of 5 cents a gallon.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. YOUNG. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRAN. As I was unable to distinguish much of what has been said, in the confusion in the Chamber, I should like to ask the gentleman to explain what he means by the statement that the "gentleman from New York" has supported or advocated a subsidy in connection with this particular industry?

Mr. YOUNG. The gentleman from New York has united in a report which brings this bill favorably before the House, and provides that the entire expense of denaturing—that is, of the supervision of the denaturing of this alcohol—shall be borne by the Government, and the reason the gentleman gave for it was that if it was not done this alcohol could not be used in competition with petroleum products for light, heat, and power.

Mr. COCKRAN. Does the gentleman mean the cost of denaturing the alcohol, or the cost of supervising it by the Government to guard against fraud?

Mr. YOUNG. The extra cost of supervision, made necessary by making this alcohol free; and as I said before, no man can gainsay the fact that that is a subsidy, when he looks at the substance and not the form, when he looks at the kernel and not at the husk.

Mr. Speaker, this whole movement in favor of free alcohol is based on the delusion that it can be denatured and produced at a price which will enable it to compete with coal-oil products for light, heat, and power. All are agreed that aside from these purposes the use of alcohol in the arts is very limited, and can not be greatly extended, except in so far as it displaces wood alcohol, which is a matter of not to exceed 8,000,000 of gallons annually; but if denatured alcohol could be produced cheap enough to compete with petroleum products for light, heat, and power then the field for its use might be greatly enlarged, and so the visionaries and the whisky trust have been vieing with each other in discovering new uses for the imagination.

They have talked of alcohol produced at 10 cents a gallon from cornstalks and potato peelings, and as one witness put it, "any old thing that contains starch or sugar."

From this modern wonderland they have created; where the alchemist and the wizard, the genii and the afrit, the inventor of perpetual motion, the discoverer of perpetual youth, and the Cheshire cat all touch elbows, where Mab is queen and Puck still tosses common sense topsy-turvy, where Aladdin's lamp has been discarded to make room for the greater virtues of denatured alcohol; in short, from that land where this bill was conceived and brought forth by the happy conjunction of Baron Munchausen and Colonel Sellers let us return to the prosier land of fact and sanity. Can grain alcohol be made at a price to compete with petroleum products for heat, light, and power? Secretary Shaw frankly says that it is impossible without the aid of the Government bounty of about 5 cents per gallon. The gentleman from Mississippi says it is doubtful if it can compete with that assistance. His opinion is based upon a supposititious cost of 18¾ cents per gallon.

The Committee on Ways and Means did not have before it a single witness who had ever made in a commercial way a single gallon of grain alcohol, but it was rich in chemists. It does not seem that it would have been difficult to get testimony on this head at first hands from some practical distiller. The most satisfactory testimony upon the subject is from Mr. Lummis, which appears on pages 197 and 413 and 414 of the hearings. On the latter page is given a detailed statement of the cost of manufacture at a distillery in Ohio having a capacity of 5,000 bushels of corn per day. This gives a net cost per gallon of 30.1699 cents per gallon. This statement is in detail and shows just what was included in the cost. It was evidently prepared with great care, but it contains nothing for interest on investment or depreciation of the plant.

The only other testimony which claims to be based on actual experience is contained in a letter from Mr. Kline, and purports to give the results attained during a series of years by a distillery at Peoria, Ill. It is not in detail, gives no data from which it can be determined what is included in the cost and what is excluded, but states a cost of 20.26 cents per gallon. In neither of these estimates is anything included for profit of manufacturer or middleman, and the proof is undisputed that that alcohol now sells at from $2.45 to $2.47 per gallon, and that the tax is about $2.07 per gallon, deducting which we now have a cost of 38 to 40 cents to the purchaser of grain alcohol, free of the tax. The mere statement of the fact shows the utter futility of the attempt to enable alcohol to compete with petroleum for light, heat, and power. We have been told that this bill is a blow at the Standard Oil Company, but that company seems not to have discovered it. It does not oppose this legislation. Apparently it looks at it with the same indifference with which it might regard the transit of Venus or the spots upon the moon. Neither are the independent producers of oil at all disturbed. Even my friend from Kansas, who has waged such a brilliant fight against the Standard Oil Company on behalf of the independent producers of his own State, is not ruffled in his equanimity, and, I presume, will vote for this bill.

If alcohol can compete with petroleum for light and fuel, why in the years before the war, when alcohol was untaxed, did it not compete more successfully for light with tallow candles and whale oil? It was not even a respectable antagonist, but they both succumbed to petroleum.

If alcohol can be made at a profit from cornstalks and potatoes in this country, why have not our distillers yet discovered it?

The oil men feel that they know what the supporters of this bill seem to ignore—that the farmer will continue to find it more profitable to turn corn into hogs and beef than into alcohol, and that the great oil industry, which produces 5,000,000,000 gallons of oil annually and exports 750,000,000 gallons, has nothing to fear from free alcohol, and that it contemplates with the greatest complacency, as does this House, the destruction of the wood-alcohol business.

But let us consider this matter a little more in detail.

This bill provides for the withdrawal from bond of denatured alcohol for use in the arts and industries, and for fuel, light, and power, without the payment of internal-revenue tax, and that the expense of excise supervision and denaturing shall be borne by the Government and not by the producers thereof.

During the past few years considerable public sentiment has been created in favor of the exemption from tax of denatured alcohol for industrial purposes. That sentiment is to a great extent artificial. It is largely based upon exaggeration, confusion, misinformation, and misunderstanding in the public mind in relation to the production and use of alcohol.

The forces behind the active, organized movement for the exemption of alcohol from taxation are powerful associations of distillers of spirits and certain industries using alcohol in their processes, although it has adroitly been made to appear as a spontaneous movement on the part of the public at large. These distillers and manufacturers, not the public, would be the principal beneficiaries of this superficial and ill-considered bill.

It is time this "free-alcohol" proposition was considered by Congress sanely and practically upon its merits.

THE ISSUES INVOLVED.

The issues involved in the consideration of this bill may fairly be classified as follows:

First. The effect upon the public revenues and the prevention of fraud thereupon.

Second. The benefits to be derived by the producers of distilled spirits and those who use it in the manufactures and arts.

Third. The benefits to the public at large.

Fourth. The effect upon established industries, such as the manufacture of pig iron, hard-wood lumber, charcoal, wood alcohol, and other by-products of charcoal, varnishes, linseed oil, turpentine, etc.

REVENUE.

The passage of this bill would deplete the public revenues to a considerable extent. It would be an entering wedge for further division of the revenue and tend toward tariff changes.

Ever since the war, distilled spirits for obvious reasons have been the primary source of internal revenue. Commencing with a nominal tax it was gradually increased to 1894, when it was fixed at $1.10 per proof gallon, or about $2.07 per gallon of commercially absolute alcohol, which rate of tax has since continued. The revenue derived therefrom last year was $129,500,000. Manifestly a revenue that yields such an amount to the Treasury is a public interest not to be recklessly disturbed. The effect of any proposition for the exemption of any form of distilled spirits from the revenue tax has always commanded the serious consideration of Congress.

To avoid misconception we may add that the term "proof gallon" is a revenue term applied to distilled spirits which contain 50 per cent water. Commercial or absolute alcohol contains 95 per cent of alcohol and 5 per cent water.

In the report of the joint committee of Congress on alcohol in the manufactures and arts, December 17, 1897, this subject was carefully considered. In the views of Messrs. O. H. Platt and Charles A. Russell, set forth in that report, it is stated, in relation to the quantity consumed, that reports of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and estimates made to that committee by George W. Wilson, deputy commissioner, placed the quantity so used approximately at 9,000,000 gallons per annum (p. 8). Mr. Evans, in his views (p. 30), says that under the proposed release of alcohol from the tax the Government "will lose a very large amount of revenue; not less than $10,000,000 annually, and probably very much more."

This estimate is at least partially recognized by Senators Platt and Russell (p. 10), where they refer "to the $10,000,000, more or less, collected annually by the Government upon alcohol used in the arts and manufactures."

Mr. Evans (p. 31) refers to the paralyzing rate of $1.10 per proof gallon imposed by the Wilson bill, and says that it is demonstrated that the burdens complained of would be greatly mitigated by a reduction of the tax rate to what would also be a better revenue-producing figure. On page 32 he again emphasizes "the fact that the quantity of alcohol used in the arts and manufactures in the United States is about 10,000,000 proof gallons annually."

In House Report No. 1444, Fifty-fourth Congress (p. 37), of report No. 411, it is stated that the best estimate made of the alcohol likely to be claimed as free under the act is 10,000,000 gallons per annum, which would result in a direct loss to the revenue of $11,000,000 per annum, and unless the strictest supervision was maintained over the whole subject of the use of alcohol the frauds committed would add many millions more to the losses of the Government.

The force of these statements was further emphasized by the statement that the distilled spirits produced more revenue than came from all other internal-revenue sources combined, amounting at that time to about $80,000,000 a year. It has since increased about $50,000,00.

Such were the conclusions of the joint committee upon the effect of the exemption of denatured alcohol from tax upon the revenues of the country after the most thorough and careful investigation and consideration of the subject ever made.

The effect of the proposed exemption of denatured alcohol from the revenue tax at the present time has received some consideration on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Commissioner Yerkes, in his remarks before the Ways and Means Committee (p. 8), stated that the proposed exemption would be a very expensive process. He expressed himself as in favor of a small tax upon each gallon withdrawn of 5 cents to 10 cents a gallon to meet this expense. This was a sound and practical suggestion. There is no just reason for imposing that burden upon the Government.

In view of the experience of Great Britain in this regard, as shown by the British Parliamentary Report of 1905, the estimate of Mr. Yerkes appears to be quite conservative.

In respect of price—

The British report says—the cost of exempt denatured alcohol is enhanced by some 40 per cent by reason of measures necessary for the protection of the revenue.

Upon the extent of the use of taxed alcohol in manufactures and the arts at the present time, Mr. Yerkes stated that the authentic records and data of the Treasury Department showed absolutely nothing. The conclusion of the Census Bureau, in Document No. 206 of 1891, was, he said, that the amount used at that time was about 9,000,000 gallons.

In view of the marvelous advance in manufacture since 1891, he justly assumes that the amount of grain alcohol used in the manufactures and the arts is much greater now than at that time (p. 9).

In referring to the increased use he evidently intended to include both taxed grain alcohol and the substitute wood alcohol used in the manufactures for various purposes. He also says that during this period there has been great advance in the processes of refining wood alcohol, so that it has to a great extent displaced the use of grain alcohol in manufacturing industries.

While these statements are more or less conjectural, the conclusion, even upon this basis, is clear. The amount of wood alcohol now used in manufacturing industries is about 7,000,000 gallons a year. The amount in 1891 was something over 1,000,000 gallons. That leaves 6,000,000 gallons of wood alcohol that has gone into the greatly increased use of alcohol in manufacturing industries since 1891. Whatever amount of both is now used for industrial purposes in excess of 6,000,000 gallons must therefore be grain alcohol. To illustrate, there were 9,000,000 gallons used in 1891, and if its use has doubled since, it follows that of the increased use, 18,000,000 gallons, all but 6,000,000 gallons would be taxed grain alcohol.

Mr. Yerkes does not undertake to estimate the amount of taxed grain alcohol now used, but says it is perfectly apparent to his mind that there is still a considerable amount used in the industries, manufactures, and arts (pp. 10 and 17).

As to the loss of revenue that would result from the exemption of denatured alcohol, he says it is impossible for him to indicate what the amount would be, having no reliable data. A very safe position (p. 15).

Secretary Shaw stated that he dared not guess what the loss of revenue that would result from the proposed exemption would be. He did not believe it would cost anything like $10,000,000; but with characteristic caution added that if it did cost that amount the Treasury could now stand it, having a surplus instead of a deficit.

In every manufacturing city in the country there are numerous industries using taxed grain alcohol in considerable quantities in preference to substitutes, and dealers who regularly supply the trade with it. While there are no reliable means at present of stating definitely the total amount used throughout the entire country, enough is known to show clearly that the aggregate is large. The committee did not undertake to gather any reliable data upon the subject.

It may conservatively be assumed, however, that the loss of revenue that would result from the proposed exemption would positively be a very considerable and probably a larger amount than is generally realized. Furthermore, the proposed bill would be followed by other strenuous demands for revenue exemption. If the exemption from tax should now be restricted to the uses so loosely stated in this bill, it is absolutely sure that immediate demands would be made for its extended use for other purposes where it is not used as a beverage, and there would be no just reason for discrimination by refusing such extension.

If Congress shall exempt from tax denatured alcohol for the hat industry of Danbury, Conn., why should it refuse similar exemption for the use of alcohol by the soap companies of Buffalo for the making of perfumeries or other special purposes? If exemption is given to them, why should Congress refuse exemption of alcohol—not denatured—even when used in preparations that are taken internally, as medicine or food, but not as a beverage? In a report of a recent meeting of the Manufacturing Perfumers' Association of the United States, published in the Paint, Oil, and Drug Reporter, the chairman of its committee on legislation stated that he thought the passage of this bill would "pave the way for a 70-cent alcohol bill, and recommended that the movement be continued for the passage of a bill giving alcohol to all trades in its pure state at a tax of 70 cents a gallon."

It goes without saying that these extended uses, whether made now or in the future, as they certainly would be, would seriously impair the public revenue.

The real significance of this bill as affecting the public revenue is shown by an article appearing in the Liquor Dealers' Journal, of Pittsburg, December 20, 1905:

> The accomplishment of this measure [a bill for denatured alcohol] is the result of the combined efforts of liquor men throughout the entire country, though they have received indorsement and financial support from manufacturers. The movement is not a sudden awakening, but is rather the result of deep thinking and investigation on the part of the liquor dealers, and is the beginning of a determined effort on their part to secure the abolition of the tax on alcohol of any description.

We repeat, therefore, that this bill is only the beginning of a movement for the impairment of the internal revenue, having for its object the reduction and ultimate abolition of the internal tax upon distilled spirits, which is to-day the primary source of internal revenue. It may significantly be observed that when this subject was investigated by the joint committee referred to many distillers of spirit, manufacturers of medicines and other articles, druggists, etc., making and using large quantities of taxed spirit, appeared at the hearings and testified vigorously as to the benefits to be derived by them from tax exemption. At the recent committee hearings, in furtherance of the assumption that tax exemption would result in little loss of revenue, they are conspicuous by their absence, and the fanciful benefits of "free" alcohol for light, heat, and power to the farmer occupied the center of the stage.

Notwithstanding all the facts shown, the committee report complacently assumes, without practical investigation of the subject, that "the objection on account of the loss of the revenue seems to have been fully overcome." This assumption is utterly misleading.

While it may be argued that the consequent benefits of this tax exemption may justify the resultant loss of revenue, there should be no delusion or self-deception on the subject now. The bill should be passed, if at all, with the expectation of resultant substantial reduction in revenue, and framed consistently with adequate safety to the revenue derived from alcohol as an article of human consumption.

FRAUD UPON THE REVENUES.

The investigation of the committee of the subject of fraud upon the revenues was superficial. Some witnesses expressed the opinion that it would be difficult or impracticable to purify alcohol after it was denatured so as to render it drinkable or fit for use for purposes other than those contemplated in this bill.

On the other hand, it was stated that extensive experiments had shown that while it would be difficult to make ordinary denatured alcohol chemically pure it could easily be made practically pure for drinking purposes by simple distillations in a simple still. Therefore, so far as this testimony shows, the subject of fraud by denaturing is a matter of conflicting opinion.

It goes without saying that the temptation and opportunity to divert ordinary methylated alcohol to uses other than those contemplated by this bill would be very great, and there would be constant danger of fraud in that regard.

The danger of fraud by illicit practice, and the consumption of comparatively harmless denatured alcohol as a beverage, to a greater or less extent, should not be minimized or overlooked. The desire for alcohol is the gravest danger to society. It is the ever-present "adder" with perpetual life. There is always the strongest incentive to obtain it for human consumption as well as other purposes. This incentive is enhanced by the maximum tax of $2.07 per gallon in this country and diminished by the minimum tax of about 72 cents per gallon in Germany. Ordinary methylated alcohol is no less drinkable than cheap whisky concoctions now consumed.

The prevention of fraud upon the spirit revenues now requires the most rigid restrictions on the part of the Government. When a distillery is to be established complete plans thereof must be made by competent engineers and filed in Washington. Its operation is under the supervision of a Government official called a "storekeeper." The grain must be weighed before and after it is ground. The hoppers have locked spouts, the mash tubs screens over them, sealed by the proper official. The outlet of the still is under lock and key. In short, the operatives are practically denied access to the product throughout the entire process of manufacture. This precaution is necessary to avoid illicit practice in the manufacture and sale of distilled spirits throughout the country. Equally stringent and expensive methods would have to be adopted in relation to the manufacture of alcohol for industrial purposes and the denaturing thereof and to prevent the demethylating of denatured products. The danger of fraud and consumption as a beverage would be very greatly increased by the manufacture and sale of methylated alcohol for the purposes of this bill.

THE REAL BENEFICIARIES OF THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION.

The theory so ingeniously urged by the advocates of this legislation as the primary reason for the exemption of denatured alcohol for industrial purposes from the internal-revenue tax, viz, that it would enable the product to be made in agricultural districts from refuse products so cheaply that it would compete with cheap petroleum for light, heat, and motive power, is without foundation.

"Free" alcohol, in the popular sense, is a delusion and a myth. Denatured alcohol is alcohol materially enhanced in cost by Government excise supervision and the denaturing process. It could nowhere in this country compete, to any material extent, with petroleum and other products for domestic use. As we have observed, it might be produced at a price that would gradually bring it into use in some localities and for some purposes where the cheapness of petroleum products is not so important in its effect, but could not be brought into practical competition with petroleum.

The advocates of the specious theory of its general use for light, heat, and power in competition with petroleum are pulling others' chestnuts from the fire. The real parties in interest who would derive the principal benefits are the distillers, who produce alcohol for the consumer, and the manufacturers who use the product in their processes.

On account of the heavy internal-revenue tax on alcohol during the past forty years, several substitutes for taxed alcohol, chiefly for solvent purposes, have been developed and come into general use, such as wood alcohol, turpentine, linseed oil, etc.

These products have been produced for much less than taxed grain alcohol, and have supplied the demands of manufacturers for cheap substitutes.

To supply this increasing demand great industries have been established and grown up throughout the country. The wood alcohol produced by the distillation of hard wood has, through modern processes, become a general substitute, chiefly for solvent purposes.

The real purpose of this bill and its principal effect would be to enable distillers to supply untaxed grain alcohol for manufacturing purposes in place of wood alcohol and other solvents at a lower price. In other words, to supplant the present output of wood alcohol, about 8,000,000 gallons annually, with untaxed grain alcohol.

The cheap "light, heat, and motive power" free-alcohol theory is put forth largely for the benefit of the distillers and solvent users of alcohol substitutes and taxed grain alcohol. Wood alcohol is now sold for solvent purposes at about 70 cents a gallon. Untaxed grain alcohol could probably be sold for manufacturing purposes at about 35 to 40 cents a gallon, and would, of course, be used in preference to dearer wood alcohol. The distillers and a few manufacturing industries would derive the benefit. That is the whole question as a practical proposition at the present time.

The desire of the makers and sellers of distilled spirits for a wider market for their products and that of certain industries for cheaper material in their business is natural and legitimate. Ordinarily they would appeal with force for the granting of assistance and relief by the exemption from the internal-revenue tax. However, when that assistance and relief involves the destruction and impairment of other established industries and loss of revenue to the Government, it becomes a question of fairness to all concerned.

This proposition involves injury and destruction to many great industries for the benefit of other industries now prosperous, and which have had the benefit of cheaper substitutes for taxed alcohol. All of these conflicting interests are entitled to consideration.

The real practical business issue should not be confused or covered up by speculation, theory, and imagination as to the unattainable under existing conditions.

As indicating the primary parties interested in this movement for free alcohol, we quote further from the article above referred to in the Liquor Dealers' Journal, of Pittsburg, December 20, 1905:

The accomplishment of this measure is the result of the combined efforts of liquor men throughout the entire country, though they have received indorsement and financial support from manufacturers, especially those engaged in manufacturing products which require the use of alcohol in the process of manufacture.

The movement is not a sudden awakening, but is rather the result of deep thinking and investigation on the part of liquor dealers, and is the beginning of a determined effort on their part to secure the abolition of the tax on alcohol of any description. To accomplish even this preliminary step required an expenditure of considerable time, effort, and money.

In this campaign neither effort, time, nor money has been spared.

The vast supplies of grain of all descriptions would be converted into alcohol at a much greater profit to the producer than would result were it disposed of as food, while the reduction in the cost to the consumer would reduce the amount expended for liquor almost nine-tenths, thus permitting the money diverted from this course to be used in other enterprises.

Liquor dealers everywhere are welcoming and aiding the movement, now that the success of the initial step seems assured, and it is but a question of time, and that brief, until the desired result—free alcohol—will be obtained.

These distillers of spirits and manufacturers constitute the forces behind the organized movement for "free alcohol" and are chiefly responsible for the seductive theories about cheap spirits for light, heat, and power that have been so freely circulated through various sources and the artificial clamor and sentiment that have been created.

Indeed, the obvious benefits that would accrue to the distillers of the country and the manufacturers, who use taxed grain alcohol or substitutes therefor chiefly as solvents, are adroitly ignored or lost sight of in the attractive, exaggerated, and delusive claims in regard to the production and use of "free alcohol" for light, heat, and power.

It should be remembered, however, that the benefits and saving that would accrue to these interests would not be sufficient to appreciably affect the price to consumers.

The maker of hats would save a cent or two on each hat, and thereby enhance his profits, but the man who wears the hat would get no reduction in price. The piano maker would save 25 cents on the material for finishing his piano, but the purchaser would not get the instrument cheaper on that account.

The joint committee in 1897, after careful investigation, recognized the distillers of spirits and special manufacturing industries as substantially the only interests that would be benefited by the exemption of alcohol from tax, and concluded that the benefits to these interests would not compensate for the loss of revenues and the injury to and sacrifice of other established industries. They were absolutely right and the same conditions exist to-day.

These distillers and manufacturing interests behind this movement for free alcohol could not now justify the loss that tax exemption would inflict by the benefits which they would derive; hence the artificial clamor and sentiment for delusive free alcohol for the farmer and public generally. This assumed public benefit could alone justify the removal of the tax. The real issues are assumed and guessed away and subordinated to artificial free alcohol for light, heat, and power. The ostrich with its head in the sand is still visible to the naked eye.

THE BENEFITS OF EXEMPTION OF ALCOHOL TO THE PUBLIC.

The crux of this entire subject as now presented to the public is the availability of untaxed distilled spirit made and denatured under Government supervision for general use not only industrially but for light, heat, and power in competition with native petroleum and other products in this country.

It is freely assumed by the enthusiastic advocates of "free alcohol" that it would not involve loss of revenue to the Government; that fraud could easily be prevented; that it would be made nondrinkable, and that its enormous consumption would provide a market for the wood-alcohol output as a denaturent and thereby protect and maintain that industry. But it is claimed that if these free assumptions should not be realized, still the benefits that would accrue to the public, and especially to the farmer, by its use industrially and for "light, heat, and motive power," would compensate for any loss of revenue and would justify the loss imposed upon established industries engaged in the production of substitutes for grain alcohol in manufactures and arts and their allied products.

It is adroitly claimed that the primary benefit of this legislation would accrue to the farmer. Through well-organized associations, apparently supplied with abundant means, a flood of literature has been circulated setting forth most attractively and seductively the blessings of "free alcohol" to the people. The extreme enthusiasts vociferously represent that "free" denatured alcohol for light, heat, and power would be made generally in small stills in agricultural districts, or even in farmyards, from corn, potatoes, fruits, cornstalks, and all kinds of refuse farm products, or, as one expressed it, "from any old thing that has sugar or starch in it."

As one witness at the hearings expressed it, they seem to expect that a machine would be set up on every crossroad and the boys would feed cornstalks in at one end and the old man would take alcohol out at the other, denature it to keep the boys from drinking it, with a Government officer at every machine. They seem to see in imagination the western farmer sitting at ease, his orchard filled with the music and the perfume of the still and a pipe line running from his cornerib and conveying light, heat, and power at his bidding.

In the interests of light, heat, and motive power it is assumed that alcohol would be made from cheap or waste material, that the refuse after the light, heat, and power had been extracted would be of sufficient value to the farmer for feed to defray the cost of making, and that the Government will relieve him of the cost of denaturing and excise supervision. All the ordinary avenues of distribution of the product from the manufacturer to the ultimate consumer and the usual manufacturers and middlemen's profits are conveniently eliminated.

While it is true that theoretically, in the laboratory, distilled spirit can be produced from various farm products and materials, and if sold to the consumer as cheap as petroleum, it would come into active competition therewith, these pictured theories as to the general production, distribution, and consumption of alcohol for light, heat, and power are obviously visionary and impractical. The alcohol of commerce and industry can not, under existing conditions, generally be produced and supplied as claimed.

Untaxed commercial alcohol would continue to be made and put upon the market under Government supervision and restrictions, just as 117,700,000 gallons of tax-paid distilled spirits was made last year, viz, in distilleries, properly equipped and operated for profit as modern business concerns, and would pass through the ordinary courses of distribution from the manufacturer to the consumer.

Untaxed denatured alcohol means distilled spirit the cost of which is enhanced materially by Government supervision of manufacture and sale and the process of denaturing. It is a commercial product, made and distributed for profit according to ordinary business methods. The popular idea of free alcohol is distilled spirit made anywhere, by anybody, in any way, with little profit to anyone, and is a myth and a catchword.

The production and use of denatured alcohol for light, heat, and motive power are governed by three considerations:

First. The conditions under which it is produced and handled.

Second. The price at which it is supplied to the consumer.

Third. The price and abundance of petroleum products. This is obvious to any thinking person, is the experience of other countries, and is recognized by the advocates of exempt alcohol in their positive insistence that the producers of denatured spirit shall be relieved of the expense of excise supervision of the manufacture and sale, and the cost of denaturing, and that this necessary expense, estimated at from 3 cents to 10 cents a gallon, shall be assumed by the Government.

In the interests of this bill every conceivable suggestion and theory that might tend to establish a presumption that denatured alcohol would be made and sold to the consumer as cheaply as petroleum have been put forth by advocates of exempt alcohol. It is generally conceded that unless this could be done alcohol could not compete with petroleum for light, heat, and power.

At the recent convention of the Manufacturing Perfumers' Association of the United States, to which I have referred, a committee of two was appointed to offer resolutions in connection with the subject of "free alcohol," and reported the following, which was unanimously adopted:

Whereas this association, viewing with much satisfaction the probable passage of the bill H. R. 17453, providing for free alcohol, as being highly beneficial to the prosperity of the country, respectfully and earnestly recommend that when conditions to be named by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue are made for the denaturing of alcohol the present internal-revenue regulations affecting the capacity of stills shall remain unchanged; or, if it be deemed necessary by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, or by the Congress, to limit the minimum capacity of stills in which alcohol may be denatured, that the minimum be not more than 250 proof gallons.

We further recommend that the cost of administration be borne by the revenues as at present in Germany, and not be made a tax upon denatured alcohol. The enhanced cost of denatured alcohol by reason of this tax would, in our opinion, seriously limit or prevent the use of denatured alcohol, especially for power, heat, and light.

This is a practical admission that, notwithstanding the predictions as to the low price at which denatured alcohol could be made and sold, its own doubting advocates feel that Government aid to the extent of the payment of excise supervision and denaturing process, at least, is essential to "free alcohol" for power, heat, and light. One of this committee was a witness appearing at the hearings of the Ways and Means Committee as head granger, who expressed the absurd opinion that a very conservative estimate of the consumption of free alcohol, after the provisions of the denaturing bill, were generally made known would be at least 200,000,000 gallons a year. The other disinterested member is the chairman of the committee of manufacturers, formed to assist in securing cheaper alcohol for industrial purposes, and is one of the associations conducting a propaganda in its favor with headquarters in William street, New York. From these headquarters millions of letters, pamphlets, and other forms of literature and directions have gone forth to educate the people according to the theories of distillers and manufacturing associations upon the benefit of "free" alcohol and to create a sentiment in its favor.

From one of these recent circular letters in my possession I quote as follows:

The wood-alcohol interests, which constitute the principal opposition to this legislation, are preparing for a vigorous contest in the Senate, and it will be necessary to bring all possible influence from their constituents to bear on the various Senators. We purpose continuing the educational work on an even larger scale, particularly among the farmers, who through the national grange and other organizations, have been giving such valuable assistance in this matter. If you have not already written to your Congressman, please do so at once, so that he will aid in securing the enactment of this legislation. We will advise you as soon as the proposed bill reaches the Senate, so that you can take action to bring this matter to the attention of the Senators from your State.

I venture to say, sir, that at this very moment an avalanche of free newspaper and circular literature is waiting, prepared and ready, to be precipitated upon the country as soon as this bill shall pass this House, for the purpose of continuing and extending the sentimental stampede in alcohol legislation.

We repeat that these associations are the real beneficiaries of this proposed legislation and largely responsible for the artificial sentiment in its favor in the interests of "light, heat, and power."

The following clipping, from a financial article in the New York Tribune of April 7 last, is a fair sample of market comments appearing in the financial papers all over the country since this bill was reported. It reveals the visage of a familiar figure in the wood pile, and indicates the interests which would really be promoted by the passage of this bill:

There are many industrials on the bargain list, notably Distilling Securities, which as a 4 per cent stock selling at 60, yields an exceptional return upon the investment—the company having, however, the prospect of new profits in large volume close at hand through the enormous increase in trade which must follow a Congressional enactment removing internal taxes from alcohol used in manufacturing. It becomes now fairly sure that the pending bill will be promptly passed. Such opposition as showed at the opening of Congress seems to have disappeared, so clear and so strong are the industrial arguments in favor of the measure. When the bill does pass, Distilling Securities dividends can not long remain at 4 per cent—the stock on earnings will become well worth par.

FREE ALCOHOL FROM FARM PRODUCTS.

In view of the extent of territory covered by our population and the high revenue tax on alcohol generally—$2.07 per gallon—the making and handling of denatured alcohol would necessarily be under most rigid governmental restrictions, as already observed, and by most complete denaturization to prevent illicit practices and fraud.

In Germany, with one-third the tax imposed here, the official supervision is very thorough, although as little stringent as is compatible with the safety of the revenue, even with low duty and the density of the population. It is looked after by an army of officials.

In Great Britain, according to the finding of the recent Parliamentary committee, the price of untaxed methylated spirits is enhanced 40 per cent by reason of measures necessary for the protection of the revenue. It is idle to talk about producing denatured alcohol commercially under these conditions from rotten apples and green cornstalks, or surplus crops in small country stills operated spasmodically and indiscriminately.

The free-alcohol orators would have us believe that when this boon strikes the farmer he would be able to start up a still whenever he saw some produce going to waste and make a few gallons of free denatured alcohol to fill his lamps, stoves, and engines.

The enormous amount of distilled spirits of every kind now produced is made by large plants economically operated, and from steady uniform supplies of material, principally corn. Even small distilleries would require expensive equipments and continuous operation under experienced business management.

The prediction that untaxed alcohol could be made commercially from potatoes—refuse potatoes, even—is also impractical and visionary. If the farmer donated his potatoes to the cause of free alcohol for light, heat, and power, alcohol could not be produced therefrom and sold to the consumer cheap enough to compete with petroleum. The American market for potatoes for human consumption precludes the use of that product for alcohol.

In Germany the manufacture of potato alcohol has been artificially developed to a considerable extent by extensive Government assistance and under conditions that do not prevail in this country. Even there the production of alcohol from potatoes yields the German farmer an average of about $4.80 a ton for his potato crop, and it yields about 25 gallons of alcohol to the ton. (British report.)

It has been shown in this country that a bushel of potatoes would yield a little less than 1 gallon of alcohol. With potatoes bringing the farmer 25 cents and upward, potato alcohol is out of the question.

Nearly the first finding of the British Parliamentary committee was, that under the agricultural conditions in that country, it would not be possible to found a profitable industry on the employment of potatoes as a material for distillation. It would likewise be utterly impossible in this country. It could not be done in Germany even, without a bounty for the producer and a heavy duty on the competing petroleum.

It is confidently asserted, as a practical business proposition, that commercial alcohol, untaxed and denatured, could not be obtained by the consumer at less than 35 cents per gallon, wholesale, under conditions existing in this country. One hundred and twenty-five million or more gallons of distilled spirits is made annually now in this country. The wholesale price for grain alcohol is 38 to 45 cents per gallon, exclusive of the revenue tax, to say nothing about the price realized from the vast amount of more refined spirits made in connection therewith for human consumption. The retail price is very much higher. Why would an enhanced output for industrial purposes be sold to the consumer for less than it is now? Would processes be more economical? Would distillers and middlemen be content with less profits? Moreover the additional cost of Government supervision and denaturing must be taken into consideration.

Pure alcohol is now exempt from tax for uses in scientific and educational institutions, for the purification of sweet wine and for the making of vinegar. These exemptions have not diminished the price of alcohol aside from the tax. Vinegar can easily be made from refuse fruit, yet the farmer does not supply the market therefor.

There is no embargo now upon the establishment of a plant in any agricultural community to make commercial alcohol out of refuse potatoes, fruit, or green corn, at prices now prevailing.

Alcohol will continue to be made in a practical way, and for at least a reasonable profit, from corn.

As to the alleged enhanced market for corn, it should be remembered that the present output of spirits, 125,000,000 annually, would require say, 25,000,000 bushels of corn from the total crop of nearly 2,700,000,000 bushels, and this consumption comes from the country at large. An increase of a few million gallons, more or less, would make no perceptible increase in the demand for agricultural products.

There was a great deal of speculative talk before the committee about the cost of denatured alcohol, although no attempt was made to examine the records of distillers and obtain all the actual items of cost. The basis of mere cost of material for the production of alcohol upon which these speculative theories were built was entirely misleading. The only cost entitled to consideration in connection with this proposition is the cost of denatured alcohol in small quantities to the average consumer.

The only reliable criterion of cost which experience in this country affords is the selling price, which is 38 to 45 cents per gallon by the barrel. It is idle to figure, guess, or speculate on any other basis. There would be no more philanthropy in the production and distribution of denatured alcohol than there is of taxed alcohol now.

Upon the false basis of cost assumed by Mr. Kline at the distillery at Peoria, it might with equal consistency be stated that refined petroleum costs about 3 cents a gallon. Last year the average market price in bulk in New York was 4.32 cents per gallon. The course of distribution to the ultimate consumer brings the real costs up to 10 cents to 15 cents, according to locality.

In Canada denatured alcohol containing 75 per cent grain alcohol and 25 per cent wood alcohol, denatured by the government, sells for $1.10 per imperial gallon. The price paid to distillers by the government for alcohol denatured for manufacturing purposes in 1905 was 25 cents to 30 cents per proof gallon, or 50 cents to 60 cents per bulk gallon. In England the wholesale price of denatured alcohol was 38 cents per gallon (p. 153). In 1905 the price to the manufacturer was 44 cents per bulk gallon. (British report, p. 5.) It is selling all over Europe at 35 cents to 40 cents per gallon. (Hearings, p. 135.)

In Germany, where the production of alcohol from potatoes is stimulated and aided by large Government bounty, and the consumption encouraged by a large import duty on petroleum products, the wholesale price of alcohol is from 26 cents to 31 cents per gallon.

According to the British Parliamentary Report (p. 11), it sold as low as 23 cents in 1902, and was 31 cents per proof gallon and 51 cents per bulk gallon in 1905.

The conditions of production in Germany, the British report says, tend to wide and rapid fluctuation in price. Its production and sale are not under natural conditions, and they afford no criterion for this country. The talk of producing and selling alcohol to the consumer in this country in any practical way at 10 cents to 20 cents a gallon is mere buncombe, and has tended to create an utterly false sentiment and expectation among the farmers of this country.

In the hearings before the committee there has been more idle and visionary talk about the prospective consumption of untaxed alcohol than upon any other phase of the subject.

Professor Wiley assumed that with a workable law there would be, in the course of a few years, 40,000,000 to 50,000,000 gallons of ethyl alcohol used in the arts and industries (p. 127). From this estimate it stretches out to 200,000,000 gallons, and so on through innumerable ciphers by the visionary, impractical advocates of free alcohol. It is just as easy to guess a thousand millions a year, when exuberant imagination is the basis, as fifty millions. Paper millions and distilled millions are different propositions.

Mr. Gray, a practical and experienced man, speaking on behalf of taxed alcohol, placed the use of untaxed denatured alcohol at 10,000,000 gallons the first year (p. 184).

Secretary Shaw, when his attention was called to Doctor Wiley's statement, stated, as his opinion, that it was idle to talk about 50,000,000 gallons. "Talk rather," he said, "about 10,000,000 gallons."

Great Britain, after an experience of half a century with tax-free industrial alcohol, uses 5,500,000 gallons a year, but none for light, heat, and power. The recent parliamentary committee, after investigation, concluded that it would be impossible to extend its use for those purposes in competition with free petroleum.

Even in Germany, after generations of Government aid, and under conditions unlike this country, it reached a total consumption for domestic and industrial purposes of 29,305,032 gallons for 1903.

The wild statements as to the use of untaxed alcohol in the industries are based upon the impractical assumption that alcohol would be produced and sold to the consumer at 10 cents to 15 cents a gallon, and thus come into competition with petroleum at about the same price. Without such an assumption there is absolutely no basis for the statements as to use.

PETROLEUM.

Cheapness and the bountiful supply of petroleum in this country eliminates the possibility of the general use of untaxed alcohol for light, heat, and motive power. In Germany it is used to some extent for those purposes in the agricultural districts where gasoline ranges in price about the same as alcohol. But when the price of alcohol exceeds that of gasoline its use diminishes. It could not compete with petroleum even in Germany without the aid of the heavy import duty on that product.

Even in Germany, with a large bounty on the production of alcohol and an import duty on petroleum, alcohol, although used to a considerable extent in agricultural districts, has not come into general use for light, heat, and power in that country, and does not come into serious competition with petroleum products throughout the country.

It is not used to any great extent in the cities where petroleum is as cheap or cheaper than alcohol.

It should also be remembered that the wages of labor in the field and factory in Germany are less than one-half the wages paid for like labor in the United States.

Cheap native petroleum is an insurmountable obstacle to the general use of denatured alcohol for light, heat, and motive power. Petroleum in this country is the logical natural source for those uses. Nature's great oil tanks are here widely distributed.

Among the wild statements made in the interest of untaxed alcohol for light, heat, and motive power was that petroleum in its refining, produced only 2 per cent of gasoline, and that with decreasing petroleum products and increasing demand it would be inadequate in quantity and prohibitory in price. The plain facts are that naphtha, benzine, and gasoline are analogous products, the only difference being in their weight or gravity. The crude petroleum of the New York market generally furnishes from 12 per cent to 15 per cent of naphtha (0.70 Baumé gravity), and in addition from 9 per cent to 12 per cent of benzine (0.63 Baumé gravity). The supply of volatile petroleum products which can be used for light, heat, and power is therefore more than ten times the amount stated at the hearings.

There was produced in the United States in 1905 about five thousand million gallons of petroleum. We quote from an editorial in the Oil, Paint, and Drug Report, of New York, March 5, 1905:

> The production of the lighter products of petroleum—that is, products such as benzine, gasoline, naphtha, etc.—has never been larger than during the past year, notwithstanding that the higher grades of petroleum have decreased; nor is there any likelihood of a decrease in the product, as the higher grades of oil are not relied upon to supply these products. The grades of crude oil, from whatever sources, contain more or less of the volatile elements, and as the total production of crude oil in the United States is increasing, the supply of the higher products may be expected to increase.

Compare this condition with Germany, where no native petroleum products exist and which has fostered alcohol with a view to becoming as independent of a foreign product as possible.

In 1905, at the refineries in Pennsylvania, gasoline sold at 7 cents, naphtha 5 cents, and 150 water white at 6 cents per gallon.

In New York the average price in 1905 was 7.22 cents per gallon in barrels and 4.32 cents in bulk. The prices, of course, are somewhat increased in interior points, but in most parts of the country do not exceed from 10 to 15 cents per gallon for light, heat, and power. The enhanced cost incident to distribution would apply alike to alcohol and petroleum.

The findings of the subcommittee of the British Parliament, after a thorough investigation of conditions in Germany, apply with still greater force to this country:

> In the United Kingdom, with cheap gas and cheap oil, no conceivable reduction in the price of methylated spirits would make spirit able to compete with them in price, and price must always be the determining motive of choice for the mass of the people. We may dismiss almost entirely the use of spirit for domestic purposes as offering an opening for the expansion in the demand for spirit in the United Kingdom.

Viewed, then, from the standpoint of facts and existing conditions instead of theory and speculation, we may also in this country dismiss the expansion of untaxed alcohol for general use in competition with cheaper native products for light, heat, and power from practical consideration in connection with this proposition.

AUTOMOBILE FUEL.

It would be likewise utterly impracticable to bring untaxed alcohol into competition with petroleum for automobile fuel. It is not as well adapted to the generation of power as the volatile products of petroleum, and even mixed with these products is an unsatisfactory substitute. The automobile engines of to-day are not properly constructed for the use of alcohol. France and Germany for years have endeavored to stimulate its use for that purpose, but have practically failed, and very little is used, foreign petroleum being the fuel in general use. The following is an article written by an entirely disinterested party upon this subject, which appeared in the Automobile Builder, a standard publication devoted to the automobile industry, November 12, 1905:

AUTOMOBILE FUEL OF THE FUTURE.

> A persistent effort is being made to have it appear that the automobile industry, in making common cause with other commercial interests for the abolition of the tax on denaturized alcohol, is actuated by a desire to hold that product, and it only, in reserve as a fuel for internal combustion engines against the day when the scarcity and costliness of gasoline may make its use prohibitive.
> At this stage of its development the industry can not afford to encourage precipitancy in the selection of a fuel the superiority of which is by no means conclusively established and for the consumption of which all past engine construction would be of comparatively little service.
> The bait is held out to automobile makers that the substitution of untaxed alcohol for gasoline would yield far greater economy and a much higher thermal efficiency. The accuracy of these representations, however, has yet to be demonstrated in actual practice. Until this confirmation is forthcoming it is probable that alcohol will command much less attention from engine designers than they now bestow upon petroleum, which product, partly from the fact of its kinship to gasoline, is regarded as in the direct line of succession as a fuel. When it shall have been ascertained that alcohol is as easily gasified as gasoline, and the low price at which it is expected to sell will not indicate its inferiority to that product, or when the scarcity of gasoline is actual rather than conjectural, it will be time for automobile makers to consider the substitution of one fuel for the other. Meanwhile the matter seems to peculiarly and exclusively concern industries—not related to ours—which are in deadly peril from competition of the French and Germans owing to the high tax on denaturized alcohol.
> It is curious to observe in the campaign which is being conducted for the abolition of the tax on denaturized alcohol that all speculation upon its increased use assumes the inadequacy of supply to demand in future years. This is begging the whole question. It is obvious that if the automobile industry could be assured that the production of gasoline would not keep pace with automobile manufacture the immediate selection of some other fuel would be warranted. No such assurance, however, can be given or predicted. It is surmised, but not known, that not more than 5 per cent of gasoline can be obtained as a by-product in the process of refining illuminating oil. It is this belief which has led to the supposition that the quantity of gasoline which can be produced depends upon the quantity of illuminating oil for which a market can be found. This imperfect reasoning overlooks the volume of gasoline which might be produced if sacrifice should be made of the profit on illuminating oil.

Standard Oil Company products, like gasoline, are usually seen in the market to an extent exactly justified by the demand and no greater. Overproduction, or anything approaching it, is scrupulously avoided. Further than this, the price at which their products are held is variable—high when there is no competition, low when competition is sharp. Having this in mind, it is quite likely that should alcohol threaten the market for gasoline as a fuel for automobiles the price of the latter would sink to the point where the profit on it was no greater than that on some other petroleum product, and thus the chief argument for the substitution of alcohol, its cheapness, would disappear.

In considering the use of a substitute fuel in automobile engines, pains should be taken to distinguish between the classes of service the vehicles are called upon to perform, for unless such a distinction is borne in mind one is apt to hastily conclude that economy in fuel is the indispensable consideration in every service. The question of fuel consumption in the operation of a gasoline touring car is very properly a subject of deep concern. On the other hand, this item of cost in an establishment employing commercial automobiles is of relatively trifling importance, as, even at the prevailing high cost of gasoline, the economy of power wagons, arising mainly from the reduction in maintenance charges, drivers' and stable wages, and the expeditiousness of the service, is so great as to make a close study of fuel economy of much less importance at the present moment than any of the main considerations.

Tons of paper have been inked in an endeavor to prove that the automobile industry at large is clamoring for the abolition of the tax on denaturized alcohol. As a matter of history and fact, however, beyond the appropriation of a small sum of money by one of our trade organizations to a committee of unrelated manufacturers "formed to assist in securing cheaper alcohol for industrial purposes," nothing has been accomplished or planned which could be twisted to imply our deep concern in the matter. All the evidence seems to indicate that automobile makers are being used to pull chestnuts out of the fire for men who make patent medicines, perfumes, silk hats, smokeless powder, picture frames, artificial silk, coal-tar dies, photographic supplies, lead pencils, furniture, varnish, soap, and thousands of other products in which alcohol, now taxed at $2.09 a gallon, is employed, and in the production of which thermal efficiency and fuel economy are terms as meaningless as geometry to a goat.

Of course, the automobile industry is glad to give reasonable assistance to any other industry, but the commercial question of alcohol for motor fuel is certainly not a vital one to the automobile industry at the present time. Nor is it likely to be in the immediate future.

STANDARD OIL.

Finally, as a last resort, the free-alcohol spokesmen and the forces behind the literature bring out the familiar bogie man "Standard Oil" and hold it up before the farmer. If these orators would turn their attention to the whisky trust they would give the public a clearer conception of the real sources of free-alcohol interest and agitation.

This bill is not "a blow at Standard Oil." It is a blow at the wood-alcohol and other allied industries, of which there are twenty in my State alone. In those industries which would be directly and indirectly affected by this deceptive legislation a hundred million dollars is invested and 100,000 people are dependent thereon and would be seriously injured thereby.

There is not the slightest reason to believe that Standard Oil interests, so called, have had even the remotest connection with the opposition to this bill.

The opposition has come from the 110 industries in the timber States engaged in the production of iron, charcoal, wood alcohol, acetate of lime, and hard-wood timber products and others whose interests are jeopardized by this bill. They have in good faith built up great industries under existing conditions and contributed to the prosperity and the glory of their States. They insist that manufactures and arts using their products have had the benefits of the cheap substitutes for taxed alcohol in their processes and that the benefits that would accrue from this legislation to distillers of spirit and manufacturers alone would not justify the sacrifice and loss to their industries.

The distillers' combination manages to stay in the game without tax exemption. The manufacturers who use alcohol or its substitutes are fairly prosperous now. They need no relief taken from the lifeblood of the wood-alcohol and charcoal industries.

There is not the slightest indication that Standard Oil anywhere feels the least solicitude over free-alcohol prophecies or threats.

With 2-cent petroleum in inexhaustible supplies they can have little fear or apprehension over even theoretical 15-cent denatured alcohol. Practical business men know that the statements as to the production and distribution of untaxed alcohol drawn from earth, air, and sunshine in competition with native petroleum are utterly impracticable.

The Standard Oil cry in press and forum is deliberately and systematically resorted to at this juncture for the purpose of arousing popular prejudice and pulling other chestnuts from the fire.

Mr. Speaker, the real interests affected by this proposed legislation justly are entitled to fair, intelligent consideration, which they have not yet received from the public nor from this Congress.

I append hereto and make a part of my remarks certain tables and statements relative to the production and use of grain alcohol in Great Britain, Germany, and the United States, and the effect of this bill on the wood alcohol and allied industries.

GREAT BRITAIN.

This country has been liberal in the use of untaxed alcohol for manufactures and the arts. In 1905 Parliament appointed a very able committee to inquire into the existing facilities for the use without payment of duty on spirits, and to ascertain the extent to which alcohol might be employed in arts and manufactures or in the production of heat, light, and motive power, and to determine the conditions of greatest freedom that could be accorded to its use for those purposes, consistently with adequate safety to the revenue derived from spirit as an article of human consumption.

Some of the findings of this committee, which evidently investigated the subject impartially, are of interest in the consideration of the subject here. They are in marked contrast with some of the theories and visionary prophecies of advocates of untaxed alcohol in this country.

They concluded that under existing agricultural conditions in that country it would not be possible to found a profitable industry on the employment of potatoes as a material for distillation.

Under the head of "Hindrances to the use of spirit for industrial purposes in the United Kingdom," they discuss the necessary enhancement of the price by the denaturing process and excise supervision.

They say that the cost of denaturing touches only a part of the question of the price of the spirit used for industrial purposes. An influence on price, even more important, lies in the conditions under which spirit can alone be manufactured there. The duty on spirit used as a beverage is very heavy, and in imposing this duty it is essential to the protection of the revenue to impose on the manufacturer such restraints as may be necessary to prevent the escape from duty, and an appreciable enhancement in the cost of manufacture is the consequence of such restraints. "In respect of price, the cost of mineralized methylated spirit is enhanced by some 40 per cent by reason of measures necessary for the protection of the revenue."

The price to manufacturers is stated to be from 40 cents to 44 cents per bulk gallon for large quantities at wholesale price. They say that spirit is not used there as a fuel for motor vehicles. Nor is it so used to any great extent either in Germany or in France, in spite of the fact that both these countries are most desirous of encouraging the use of a material that is indigenous in preference to a material, like petroleum, that has to be imported. Where spirit is used for motor or other engines in those countries it is almost entirely for agricultural engines. The question of the use of spirit for motor vehicles is regarded as largely one of price, and as the price of petroleum is about half the price of methylated spirit the consideration thereof might be delayed until such time as there might be an approximation between the price of petrol and spirit to create a practical alternative of choice between the two.

They recommend as a further encouragement to the use of alcohol industrially an allowance to the producer of a portion of the cost of excise restrictions and a reduction of the amount of wood naphtha for methylating. These recommendations, we understand, were not adopted. They gave the price at that time in Germany of denatured alcohol as 31 cents per proof gallon and 51 cents per bulk gallon.

The amount of methylated spirit used then in the United Kingdom was given as 2,200,000 gallons for domestic use and 3,300,000 for industrial use, a total of 5,500,000 gallons; and they say that any prospective increase must, for a long time to come, lie well within the limit of 3,500,000 gallons.

[There were no American prophets on that committee, no literary bureaus or distillers or manufacturers' associations to create false sentiment about free alcohol for light, heat, and power.]

GERMANY.

Perhaps no phase of the discussion of the subject of the industrial use of alcohol has given rise to grosser misconceptions than the production and use in Germany. Under the exceptional conditions existing that country affords no practical criterion for the development of the use of alcohol for industrial purposes in this country. Germany has no native petroleum products. The development of the use of alcohol for light, heat, and power was first undertaken by the Government as a war measure, so that the country might be, as far as possible, independent of imported petroleum products.

A subcommittee of the British parliamentary committee of 1905 visited Germany to investigate the production and use of alcohol industrially, and reported the results of their inquiries. From that report we give the following results of their investigation:

The price of spirit in Germany for industrial purposes fluctuates very widely, being at that time considerable higher than the price of similar spirit in Great Britain, and even in normal years its price is not as much below the price in Great Britain as the committee had been led to suppose.

The consumption of spirit in Germany for domestic purposes affords no standard by which to measure the possible consumption for similar purposes in the United Kingdom. (P. 113.) [Much less would it afford a standard for the United States.]

Completely denatured spirit is used almost entirely for agricultural engines, as no satisfactory solution has yet been found of certain difficulties which beset its use for motor cars. (P. 114.)

The cost of prima denatured spirit used for fine chemicals was then 52 cents per bulk gallon, not including a vat tax. (P. 19.)

They describe the processes of agricultural distilleries under Government supervision and assistance to manufacture alcohol from potatoes. Even with the then abnormally high price of spirit the amount realized from potatoes so used for distillation was £2 to £2 5s. per ton, whereas if sold for consumption they would realize £4 per ton. In normal years the return from potatoes for alcohol averages 20s. per ton. The yield of alcohol from a ton of potatoes is about 25 gallons. (Pp. 21 and 22.)

On the subject of the production and price of spirit in Germany they say:

The production of spirit in Germany is a State-aided enterprise, of which the primary purpose is not so much the production of spirit on economic lines as the encouragement of agriculture in the less fertile provinces of the Empire. (P. 24.)

The system is essentially communistic in character. The fundamental principle of the scheme is to make those interested in the production of alcohol sharers with the State in the revenue collected on spirit used for potable purposes. (P. 24.)

In the year 1903 the total production of spirit in Germany was, in round figures, 132,000,000 proof gallons, and the subvention, or the amount given back to those interested in alcohol production, represented a bonus of nearly 9 cents a gallon on all spirit produced.

As a rule the bounty or bonus is retained by the producers and the users are not generally benefited by this State aid.

The price charged for spirit of the first quality was then (1905) 31 cents per proof gallon, as against 20 cents per proof gallon in Great Britain, equivalent to about double those prices in bulk gallons. (P. 25.)

The price of industrial spirit in Germany at that time was higher than in Great Britain, and the price there is subject to violent fluctuations, and although at times it has been and probably will again be appreciably below the British price it is doubtful whether its normal level in the future will show any material advantage to the user. (P. 26.)

A question that pressed itself strongly upon the attention of the committee was how far consumption of spirit for domestic and industrial purposes in that country could be taken as a measure of the possible consumption for similar purposes in Great Britain. [A still more pertinent question in the United States.]

The committee gave the consumption in Germany for the year ending September 30, 1903:

	Proof gallons.
For domestic purposes, about	33,900,000
For motor and other engines	1,100,000
For industrial purposes	14,000,000
Total	49,000,000

The large consumption in Germany for domestic purposes, for heating, cooking, and lighting, is due not to the absolute cheapness of spirit or to any special advantages that it possesses as an agent for producing heat and light, but is due solely to its cheapness as compared with other agents—coal, gas, or oil. Of these oil is the agent that most directly competes with spirit, and in Germany oil, in the interests of alcohol, is subjected to a duty of nearly 5 cents a gallon (p. 29).

The price of petroleum in Germany was 21 cents, while in the United Kingdom it was 10 to 14 cents. The price of methylated spirit in bulk gallons was then 43 cents in Germany (normal price, 24 cents), while in Great Britain it was 48 to 60 cents. The price given for petroleum in Germany was the price in Berlin, and there it was cheaper than spirit, consequently, having to compete with gas as well as with oil, it is very little used there for domestic purposes, probably not more than in Great Britain. In rural districts oil is probably dearer than in Berlin and more difficult to procure, whereas methylated spirit is of universal distribution, and it is, therefore, in those rural districts that the main consumption takes place. In the United Kingdom, with cheap oil and cheap gas, no conceivable reduction in the price of methylated spirit would make it able to compete with them in price, and price must always be the determining motive of choice for the masses of the people, for, though spirit has certain advantages in directions other than price, they are not of any marked significance in themselves, nor are they of a character to appeal very powerfully to the masses.

Accordingly, they say we may dismiss almost entirely the use of spirit for domestic purposes as offering an opening for expansion in the demand for spirit in the United Kingdom. [This is in marked contrast with the wild predictions that hundreds of millions of gallons of untaxed denatured alcohol would be used in the United States for light, heat, and motive power.]

With spirits for industrial purposes the case is different. But even here a large abatement must be made from the German figures before they can be taken as a possible measure of British consumption. Of the 14,000,000 gallons used in 1902 and 1903, 6,350,000 gallons were employed for vinegar making, a purpose for which not at present used in Great Britain. Another 2,650,000 gallons is used for polishes, varnishes, etc., an industry which in Great Britain enjoys special advantages and which may be supposed to have reached a pretty full measure of development, and under which it employs some 1,800,000 gallons of spirit. This leaves some 5,000,000 gallons used in Germany for miscellaneous purposes, for which Great Britain uses some 1,500,000 proof gallons.

On these figures they place the increased demand that might arise for spirit in Great Britain in consequence of an expansion of its use for industrial purposes at less than 3,500,000 proof gallons (p. 27).

It will therefore be seen that the policy of Germany is to stimulate and subsidize the development of a domestic product for the promotion of agriculture and to discourage dependence upon a cheap foreign product, while that of Great Britain is to favor the production of alcohol for manufactures and arts, but to admit free for consumption cheap petroleum products.

Therefore in Germany, alcohol, thus assisted by the Government, is used to a considerable extent, principally in the agricultural districts, for light, heat, and power, while in Great Britain it is not. Even in Germany, however, its use for domestic purposes is small as compared with even high-priced petroleum products.

How absurd, therefore, to assume that in the United States untaxed denatured alcohol, not assisted, but its price enhanced by denaturing and excise expense, could compete with cheap native petroleum, economically distributed to the amount of billions of gallons annually from increasing sources, for light, heat, and power. The assumption that it would be generally used is delusive and misleading.

In Germany, after many years of government support and encouragement, the amount used for light, heat, and power in 1903 was about 18,500,000 American gallons, while the amount used for manufacturing purposes was less than in the United States with its high tax.

In 1905 the amount used for light, heat, and power in Germany was 26,000,000, and for manufacturing purposes about 7,000,000 gallons. On page 259 of the committee hearings is a report over the signature of Frak H. Mason, consul-general at Berlin, in which he seeks to correct some erroneous impressions created in this country in relation to alcohol in Germany.

He says that, aside from a small amount produced for drinking and medicinal purposes from fruits, the great sources of alcohol are potatoes, grain, and the secondary molasses product from the sugar beet. The total production for the year ending August 31, 1904, was, substantially:

	Gallons.
From potatoes	80,500,000
From grain	18,300,000
From beet molasses	3,000,000
Total	101,800,000

In respect to the use of alcohol for motor purposes he says:

"Several years ago, when the motor vehicle for military and industrial purposes began to assume a new and extraordinary importance, the German Government became impressed with the necessity of building motors that could be operated with some liquid fuel that could be produced in Germany in the event that, through the chances of war or other cause, the supply of imported benzine and other petroleum products should be cut off. Alcohol offered the solution of this problem, and all the influence of the Government was exerted to encourage its production and its more extended use for motor purposes. Prizes were offered for the best alcohol-driven draft wagon for military and agricultural purposes, and all the great gas-motor builders gave great attention to perfecting engines specially adapted to the use of alcohol as fuel.

"At the same time a powerful organization known as the Centrale für Spiritus-Verwerthung, with central offices at Berlin and branches throughout the Empire was established and began a systematic, persistent campaign to encourage and extend the use of alcohol for various industrial and economic purposes, especially heating, cooking, and lighting. Special exhibitions were held from year to year, which have been fully described in these reports, and in which were displayed the whole apparatus and process of alcohol production from potatoes, corn, and molasses, motors of various types and sizes for marine, agricultural, and industrial purposes, and a vast assortment of alcohol stoves for heating, cooking, ironing, etc., and lamps and chandeliers in endless variety, in which alcohol vapor burned inside an incandescent mantel, produced a light of high intensity and cheaper for rural districts of Germany than either electricity or petroleum.

"The net result of all this systematic effort has been to extend so rapidly the use of alcohol for heating, lighting, and chemical manufacturing purposes that when the drought of last summer reduced somewhat seriously the output of potato alcohol, the previous surplus was exhausted, and the price advanced until alcohol became too costly for economical use as fuel for motors.

"The consequence of all these conditions has been that, while the general use of alcohol for industrial purposes, heating, lighting, and a vast range of chemical and other manufacturing purposes has steadily increased in Germany, the percentage of the whole product that is used for motor purposes is relatively small and, so far from increasing, is said to be rather diminishing, though to just what extent it would be difficult to prove. A few Germans, from patriotic motives, use alcohol for driving automobiles, freight wagons, motor boats, and farming machinery. A single department store in Berlin, which ordered its equipment of delivery wagons four years ago, during the height of the alcohol-promotion movement, still consumes yearly 80,000 liters (about 19,000 gallons) of alcohol for driving these wagons, but mixed for greater efficiency with about 15 per cent of benzole.

"It has been found by elaborate tests that the economy of alcohol as a fuel for gas motors is largely increased by its being carbureted through admixture with a certain percentage of benzole or other product of mineral oil. For a time it was believed that this admixture of benzole could not be safely carried beyond 20 per cent, but more recent experience has shown that a mixture of equal parts of alcohol and benzole can be used, especially in large motors, with entire safety and economical results. For automobile purposes the usual proportion is now about 30 per cent of benzole or gasoline, but at the present cost of alcohol it can not compete on the score of economy with mineral hydrocarbons in a country where they are either produced or improved free of duty."

In a statement showing the production of distilled spirits in Germany and the United States (p. 316 of committee hearings) to appears that the total proof gallons was as follows:

Year.	Germany.	United States.
1888	161,567,693	71,068,188
1902	223,899,120	128,623,402
Increase	62,331,427	56,935,214

Consumption of tax-free alcohol in Germany.

	Proof gallons.
1888	20,476,768
1902	58,632,840
Increase	38,156,072

Increase of tax paid spirits in the United States in 1888 to 1902 was 33,000,000 gallons.

In 1903 and 1904 the amount in Germany appears from the same statement to have materially decreased.

In 1903, proof gallons	178,629,739
In 1894, proof gallons	203,221,929
In 1903, tax free	68,065,694
In 1904, tax free	73,635,249

The bulk gallons would, of course, be about one-half the above amounts.

A careful study of the conditions in Germany must convince any practical man that its system of production and use is an absolute impossibility in the United States.

In Germany the production of alcohol is cheapened by direct government aid and competing petroleum enhanced in price by an import duty of 5 cents a gallon. This duty is more than the selling price of refined petroleum products in New York.

These facts alone would make a difference of about 10 cents a gallon between the prices of those products in this country and Germany, in favor of Germany, to say nothing about the cheaper raw material and labor in that country.

THE EFFECT OF THE PROPOSED EXEMPTION BILL UPON INDUSTRIES CONNECTED WITH THE PRODUCTION OF SUBSTITUTES FOR TAXED GRAIN ALCOHOL.

If this proposition did not involve such serious consequences to many other established industries it would appeal with considerable force to Congress even though it involves material reduction of the public revenues.

Looking at it from a practical standpoint it would afford relief and benefit to industries supplying untaxed denatured alcohol to the consumer, and to other industries now using taxed grain alcohol, or substitutes therefor, although these industries generally are now prosperous, and would also probably encourage and facilitate to some extent the expansion of their business and the establishment of other industries using alcohol.

We submit, however, that these benefits to a few interests would not justify at the present time the enormous loss that would result to many industries built up under the existing revenue system to supply a cheap substitute for taxed grain alcohol in the manufactures and arts.

There are at the present time, located principally in the timber States—Pennsylvania, New York, Michigan, and Wisconsin—more than 100 charcoal and chemical plants engaged in the production of charcoal, wood alcohol, and other by-products thereof. Many of these plants are operated in connection with furnaces for the reduction of iron ore, which consume the charcoal product, and with hard-wood industries, which supply, through refuse and inferior hard-wood timber, the material for the making of charcoal. They are allied industries in which a great many millions of dollars are invested, and in connection with which many thousands of men are employed. They are among the most important industries of these timber States. The chemical plants connected therewith represent large investment and employ a great deal of labor. They were built to utilize the waste products in the manufacture of charcoal and could be used for no other purpose.

Operated in connection with the charcoal plants, the practical result is a material reduction in the cost of producing charcoal for the iron furnace. The charcoal plants enable the hard-wood lumber men, in connection with their lumber operations, to utilize the refuse and inferior woods as the timber is cut, and thereby to prevent timber waste and prepare the ground for cultivation. This affords varied employment for armies of men in connection with these industries which have contributed to the development and prosperity of the country in which they are located. The cheap charcoal resulting diminishes the cost of pig iron of the highest grade.

Now, just a word as to these products. In Pennsylvania and New York charcoal is made from small inferior timber and is used for various purposes. In Michigan it is also made from refuse and inferior hard woods, and generally in connection with the manufacture of hard-wood lumber. Indeed it may be said to be in the nature of a by-product of hard-wood lumbering, enabling the lumberman and timber owner to utilize the vast amount of inferior timber that would otherwise go to destruction and waste. The utilization of this refuse timber cheapens the cost of hard-wood lumber and gives investment to a great deal of capital and employment to armies of men. The product is largely used for the smelting of iron ore, producing a superior grade of pig iron used for special purposes, such as car wheels, etc.

When, during the civil war, the Government, for the purpose of revenue placed a tax on ethyl alcohol it created a necessity for a substitute for use as solvents and other and divers manufacturing purposes. "Necessity is the mother of invention," and to supply it in this case the wood-alcohol industry developed.

Great industries sprang up in the timber States for the production of wood alcohol and acetate of lime in connection with the destructive distillation of wood in the making of charcoal. This cheapened the cost of charcoal and provided two additional valuable articles of commerce and industry.

These industries became of great magnitude, supplying the demand for substitutes for grain alcohol in the arts and manufacturing and assisting materially in the great industrial development of the past twenty-five years.

From the smoke of the charcoal furnace which previously went into the air wood alcohol, so called, and acetate of lime were produced. The former was unfit for beverage because it was poisonous when taken internally. It was found to be a perfect substitute for grain alcohol in other than drinkable uses, was not the basis for whisky making and intemperance, and was therefore used to a large extent in place of grain alcohol produced by distillers, who watched the development thereof with envious and covetous eyes.

The vast improvement of refining processes has produced in wood alcohol an article of commerce not only of general industrial utility, but having marvelous antiseptic and curative properties when externally applied, and of great benefit for many other purposes.

The amount of wood alcohol produced in 1905 was about 8,000,000 gallons. At the same time there were produced more than 60,000 tons of acetate of lime, which is used in the manufacture of acetic acid, white lead, colors, and other important articles.

This bill, if enacted, will tear down, not build up. It will tear down these industries, of great value to the country, upon a speculative and impractical theory of alcohol for light, heat, and power in competition with petroleum.

It is conclusively shown by men actively connected with the practical management of these numerous allied industries that the wood alcohol of their chemical plants can not be produced and sold to the consumer as cheaply as denatured untaxed ethyl alcohol could be sold, assuming that it would be sold as low as 35 cents to 40 cents a gallon. The effect would be that the untaxed ethyl alcohol would take the place of a large portion of the wood-alcohol output of these chemical plants, amounting to about 8,000,000 gallons a year, and would practically destroy that part of their industries.

The effect of this destruction of the chemical plants would in turn materially affect the charcoal industry and enhance the cost of the manufacture of that product. This in turn would seriously impair the hard-wood operations, and make it practically impossible to consume the large amount of refuse and inferior timber in connection with their lumbering operations. The result upon the manufacture of pig iron would inevitably be to enhance the cost of that product. The increase in the actual cost of charcoal pig iron would be from $1.50 to $2 per ton.

The men connected with these great industries appeal to Congress for a careful, deliberate, and just consideration of their interests. They are and have been material factors in the development and prosperity of great communities. Their industries have been built up under existing conditions, the existing revenue tax, and the demands for substitutes for taxed alcohol in the manufactures and arts.

The industries that would derive the principal benefits of this legislation have for many years received the benefit of the comparatively cheap substitute supplied by these industries. The immediate removal of the entire tax upon grain alcohol is not essential to their continued prosperity and profit, while such exemption would destroy the market for the larger portion of the output of their chemical plants, and would impose enormous and irreparable loss upon those industries, and the labor connected with them would suffer.

If it could be demonstrated that the exemption of denatured alcohol for general industrial use would confer such general material and unprecedented benefit upon the people of this country as its enthusiastic advocates claim, the proposed legislation would justify not only the present and future loss of revenue to the Government, but the entire destruction and sacrifice of these existing industries.

The predicted results, however, viewed from a practical business standpoint, are entirely visionary and theoretical, and should be dismissed from the practical consideration of this business proposition.

Speculate and theorize as we may upon possible future blessings attainable through the beneficent influence of free alcohol, the practical question for immediate consideration is whether it is proper and just to favor the producers of alcohol and those who use it in the manufactures and arts, and increase the profit accruing to them at the expense and sacrifice of these great industries in the timber States. The increased profits and savings they would enjoy would not lower prices to consumers.

It has been urged by the advocates of free alcohol that if it would not result in its general use for light, heat, and power, in competition with petroleum, it would not materially injure the producers of wood alcohol and their substitutes.

This argument is based upon utter misapprehension of the practical features of the proposition. The removal of the revenue tax would enable denatured grain alcohol to be sold for probably 35 cents to 40 cents a gallon. The wood alcohol could not be produced and sold by chemical plants at the present time for any such price at a profit. The result would be that the present consumers of wood alcohol would at once use denatured grain alcohol in place of the wood alcohol, thus destroying the market therefor.

The managers of the allied interests referred to know this, and as practical business men also know that there would not be, for a long time at least, any material increase in the consumption of denatured alcohol for light, heat, and fuel, and would consequently, upon the passage of this bill, have to close down most of their chemical plants and prepare to meet material loss and disarrangement of the charcoal and iron business.

The advocates of free alcohol, absolved from all responsibility in the matter, confidently and vociferously predict that the consumption of free alcohol for light, heat, and power would increase so rapidly and enormously as to afford a market for the wood-alcohol product of these plants for denaturing purposes.

The practical business men connected with those plants know that this kind of talk is visionary and impractical, and being responsible, as business men for their industries protest against the hazard of the interests of capital and labor connected therewith upon the speculative theories of free-alcohol advocates.

In view of the facts and conditions as they exist, this matter resolves itself into a plain practical business problem which Congress should not undertake to solve by hasty legislation based so largely upon speculative and visionary theories, and involving such serious consequences to existing industries.

Congress and the country, in view of these facts and circumstances, can well afford to take time for a more serious consideration and investigation of this subject, by all the interests concerned upon its merits in order to bring about a careful, deliberate solution thereof, with fairness and justice to all.

Mr. DRESSER. Mr. Speaker, I am not a public speaker, nor do I pretend to be an orator. I am a plain business man acquainted with the laws governing a business world, and somewhat familiar with the tariff legislation which it is the object of this bill to change. But I feel that I would not be doing my duty to the constituency which sent me here were I not to say a few words in opposition to the monstrous iniquity of this measure.

I repeat that I am not a speaker, and have a natural timidity in efforts of this kind. I am very much like the boy whose duty it was to take the cows to pasture every morning and to bring them home at the close of day. His path to and fro led him through a piece of woodland, whose darkening shadows carried fear to his timid heart. Upon approaching the woodland the boy hastened the pace of his cows into a trot and gave them no opportunity to stop until he had safely emerged on the other side. The knowledge of this timidity on the part of the boy soon became known to all the farm hands and they resolved to give him such a lesson as would forever cure his fear. One of these farm hands secured a bear skin, wrapped himself up in its capacious folds, and hid himself in the wood. At the proper time the boy appeared with his cows at a full run. As the boy passed the place where the would-be bear was secreted, a great bear sprang out after him. The already timid boy was now frightened almost to death, and began to run as though the "Old Boy" himself were after him. He was blinded with fright, forgot the cows, and gave his whole attention to fleeing from the impending danger. But, alas! In his blind fear he no longer picked his steps, and tripped himself over a small handspike which lay in his way. He went down to the ground, and as he arose eager to continue his flight, the bear came upon him. There was no longer any chance to run. It was fight now or die, and in his desperation he resolved to fight. The handspike was at his feet, and seizing it he gave one mad blow which sent the bear rolling over and over, loosened his hide, and disclosed the bleeding, disconsolate man. It was no longer fun for the man. The boy's fear vanished at once as he beheld himself master of the day.

Now, like this boy, I have no desire to fight. But my friends of the Ways and Means Committee have disguised themselves in the bear skin of ferocity, have secreted themselves in the woodland of discriminating legislation, and are seeking to destroy the carefully established industries of my people. I do not want to fight, but the gentlemen composing the Ways and Means Committee of this House have left nothing else for me to do. In the language of the day, "I am up against it," and must fight or move out of the Twenty-first Congressional district of Pennsylvania, and if some good angel will lend me the lucky handspike, I will use it with all my might and continue to use it until I have defeated this bill.

And at the very beginning of the fight I desire to say that I am a Republican, representing a Republican district in a Republican State. As a Republican I have always given my support to the doctrine of protection, as has my district and my State. The remarkable prosperity which has followed the growth of the protective idea in the United States has endeared it to me, to my people, and to the great majority of the people of the country. So dear is the doctrine of protection to the Republican party that the dictum "stand pat" has gone forth, not alone from those high in authority in this House, but also from the great leaders of the party throughout the Union. The flag of nonrevision has been hoisted by the party, and it is very strange to me that legislation, such as is presented by this bill, should have the almost unanimous support of the Committee of Ways and Means of this House. I consider it an unfair stroke, a vicious stroke, and to the extent of my ability shall fight it to the bitter end.

I have the honor to represent a constituency, a very large number of whom are interested and another very considerable number of whom are dependent upon the manufacture of wood alcohol, the industry which it is the purpose of this bill to destroy. The Twenty-first Congressional district of Pennsylvania may be said to be the home of the wood-alcohol business. Of the 118 establishments of the United States, 25 of them are located within its bounds. These 25 establishments give employment to 1,258 people; they use daily 629 cords of wood, whose annual value is very nearly $2,400,000; the money invested in their factories amounts to nearly $2,000,000; the railroads and tramways owned by them have a value of about $300,000. In my district alone $5,000,000 is invested in the manufacture of wood alcohol, giving labor to thousands of persons in the factory and forests, and giving prosperity to the four counties of which my district is composed. These 25 factories are independent industries, having no alliance with any other interests, connected in no way nor relying in any manner upon the operation of any other industrial plant. The investments necessitated by them were made principally for the production of wood-alcohol industries developed within the past forty years, and made possible only by the imposition of that revenue tax which this bill seeks to remove.

By the acts of the Republican party, acts of which in every convention its orators boast, heavy internal-revenue taxes were placed upon grain alcohol. This made this article of commerce high and forced manufacturers to the use of a cheaper article. By the acts of the Republican party manufacturers were driven from the use of grain alcohol to that of wood alcohol. By these acts my constitutents were induced to invest their capital in wood-alcohol establishments and to develop an industry which has made itself invaluable to almost every part of my district. It has built towns, created wealth, and aided labor. Under the commercial demand for the substitute—wood alcohol—other manufacturers were induced to make large investments in factories and materials for the supply of the new demand, thereby aiding the agricultural communities of Pennsylvania.

Since 1865 there has been invested in this American industry many millions of dollars. There are now 118 establishments scattered over Maine, Vermont, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Alabama, Wisconsin, and Missouri. They give employment to more than 20,000 men, and have been of the very greatest benefit to the manufacturers and consumers of the country by creating a satisfactory substitute for high-priced grain alcohol.

In 1905 they produced about 7,500,000 gallons of wood alcohol, of which about 800,000 gallons were exported. While grain alcohol sold at from $2.10 to $2.45 per gallon, a good wood alcohol sold at from 50 cents to 75 cents, and met the fullest demands of the manufacturing industries of the country.

The average revenue tax on grain alcohol is about $2.07, which this bill proposes to remove on condition that it be denaturized. To denaturize grain alcohol will put the Government into private business. Swarms of officials will be created, warehouses erected, and money squandered. And when the denaturizing is done a new avenue for fraud on revenues is created. Two distillations of the denaturized product will free the pure alcohol from the denaturizing agent and put free alcohol on the market free of tax. By a series of revenue acts you made it impossible for American manufacturers to use grain alcohol; by and through these acts the wood-alcohol business sprang into life, developed healthful proportions, and is to-day fully equipped for the fullest supply of every American demand. At the behest of gigantic alcohol interests, who have warehoused vast quantities of grain alcohol for which there is no demand at its tax-paid price, you now propose to change the revenue laws, to remove the $2.07 tax, to denaturize the product, and make it free. By one flourish of the wand you make it possible to sell an article which yesterday brought $2.45 for 40 cents. The Government proposes to lose $2.07 a gallon for whose benefit and at whose charge? The entire benefit will go to the grain-alcohol producers, already a most flourishing class, and will bring ruin to the wood-alcohol industries of the entire country. By this change the denaturized product will sell for 40 cents, and the wood alcohol, already at its lowest price, will be forced from the market and the industry destroyed.

Is this the way you propose to manage the Republican doctrine of protection? Is this the way in which you propose to foster American labor and American industries?

It was but a few days ago that the distinguished gentleman from New York wrote to the distinguished gentleman of Massachusetts that the tariff could not be revised during this Congress. In that letter he voiced the sentiments of the majority of Republicans throughout the country, and for that sentiment he was applauded.

But something has happened since. He has had a taste of grain alcohol and seems so deliriously and gloriously drunk that he is willing not only to lower the tax on that product, but to go the full length of his tether, and make it entirely free.

I would like to call the sober attention of the distinguished gentleman to the words of the ancient king of Israel, as recorded in the Book of Books:

Look not upon denaturized alcohol in its free form, when it pays no tax, for at the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder.

A careful survey of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee reveals some wonderful properties in grain alcohol, denaturized alcohol, and wood alcohol. The trend of the inquiry was, "Can the denaturized product be redistilled, so as to give pure alcohol the benefit of this act?" One chemist said that it could, but that the expense would be so great as to forbid the distillation, to say nothing of the deterring influence of the penitentiary. This chemist was a Government chemist, a disciple of denaturized alcohol, and a bold adventurer in the field of experiment. The books of the Agricultural Department teem with the projects of this gentleman, and disclose the fact that with him "Whatever is is wrong, and all that isn't is right." He stops at nothing, and if permitted to go on in his revolutionary career will soon fill the land with inspectors and spies.

Another chemist said that denaturized alcohol, by two simple distillations, could be undone. There we have it. The doctors disagree, and the science of chemistry becomes an adjunct to political schemes, and Government chemistry usurps the place of independent investigation.)

The hearings also disclosed an earnest effort on the part of the committee to ascertain whether denaturized alcohol would make a man drunk. The inference sought to be created was that if this movement would increase intemperance that it was not to be encouraged. What a marvelous masquerade. And what was the evidence? All the witnesses agree that denaturized alcohol would be drunk by a certain class, but that this class was so degraded as to be outside the reach of political philosophy. The evidence also disclosed the fact that denaturized alcohol had as yet no position in the United States, and that therefore the evil was not imminent. But the evidence from England, where denaturized alcohol is on the market, is clear and unmistakable. The London Lancet, one of the most eminent of medical periodicals, had this to say:

[The Lancet, London.]

DRINKING OF METHYLATED SPIRIT.

Dr. Matthew Hay, in his annual report, draws attention to the growing use of methylated spirit as an intoxicant. It is not perhaps generally known that with a view to enable persons engaged in certain industries to obtain an alcoholic spirit for industrial purposes at a relatively small cost the Government authorized the addition to alcohol of petroleum oil, etc., the mixture thus produced being practically free from the duty imposed upon ordinary spirits. It was thought that if the spirit was thus rendered nauseous no one would be tempted to use it as an intoxicant. But in Doctor Hay's experiences this addition has failed in its object and he thinks that the poorer and more degraded class of drinkers are using the altered spirit as an intoxicant in an increasing degree. He finds that the traffic in it is mainly in half penny and penny worths, as much being procurable for a penny as would be equivalent to two glasses of whisky. As an indication of the extent to which the trade in methylated spirit is carried on, it may be mentioned that as many as seventy men have been seen to enter a certain grocery shop in the east end in less than two hours. Each is provided with a bottle, and having procured the needed spirit, proceeds to a neighboring water tap to dilute the spirit before drinking it.

And the London Sun under glaring headlines printed the following:

[The Sun, London.]

A NATIONAL DANGER—INCREASE IN METHYLATED SPIRIT DRINKING.

A matter upon which temperance reformers might with advantage concentrate their efforts for a time, and one which must command the attention of the legislature shortly, is the terrible increase of drinking almost anything with spirit in it by those who have descended to the lower levels of intemperance and poverty.

"It is now at a point," declared a scientist and medical man lately, "at which it becomes a grave national danger, threatening even our position as a civilized people."

The practice of indulging in this awful compound is becoming so general in the city and the surrounding district as to induce the poisoning of those who would form the next generation of citizens. It is also causing increased crimes, notably of a violent character.

Nor was this all. The testimony of the Secretary of Agriculture was so full of the mellowing influences of grain alcohol as to lead a prudent man to wonder. Micawber always saw things large and most frequently saw them double, two characteristics which always attend the too free use of the flowing bowl.

Now, it appears to me that the fictitious character Micawber has become real in the person of the Secretary of Agriculture and that the real Micawber exceeds the hero of fiction to about the same extent that an arc light outshines a tallow candle.

The Secretary saw a wonderful field for denaturized alcohol. All the surplus corn of the country, all the surplus rye would find a market in the alcohol factories. Not content with this large and enthusiastic vision, he painted the whole North planted in Irish potatoes and the whole South in yams, the farmers tremulous with Wall street excitement waiting for the teeming pots of gold. His vision saw alcohol lamps on every table of the land and standard oil stranded, bankrupt, and forlorn.

Wonderful possibilities! Wonderful hopes! Every cornstalk now rotting in the fields was to rise from its abject poverty and yield unbounded wealth.

Is it necessary to go further for an answer to the question, "Will denaturized alcohol make a man drunk?" It converted a staid official into a dreamer and made the Ways and Means Committee tipsy with delight. In the face of this dreaming, this enthusiasm for the possible, let us turn again to the actual.

One hundred and eighteen establishments are already here. They are on the ground. They are actually supporting thousands of families. They are a real element in our national wealth. They have grown up in response to the law of supply and demand and have carried prosperity, wealth, and vigor into communities all over the land.

In my district the industry is a most flourishing one. Its farmers are gladdened each year by a market for from $400,000 to $600,000 for their wood. They have bought timber from these farmers for future use amounting to $2,000,000 or more. They pay labor in the factories from $500,000 to $1,500,000 every year. These twenty-five manufactories are the mainstay of a large part of my constituency. The passage of this bill will cause every one of these establishments to shut down, for, as they assure me, they can not manufacture wood alcohol in competition with denaturized, tax-free, grain alcohol. All their plants and machinery will be converted into old junk and a large number of honest investors reduced to financial bankruptcy. This bill will injure my district more than the worst panic of Wall street ever carried to the speculative interests of New York.

The grain-alcohol business under existing law is a most prosperous one. It is not and has not been injured by the revenue tax. Nor is there any just ground for the belief that a change in the law will increase its prosperity or add one penny to the general prosperity of the country. Certain it is that denaturized alcohol will never displace kerosene oil, and it is this hope that leads many of my colleagues to countenance the bill.

I know, on the other hand, that the passage of this bill will injure the people of my district and the people of many other districts throughout the land. I know that thousands of people outside of the owners of the enterprises are dependent upon them, and that they will suffer. I know that thousands of men and women will be reduced to want, and that hundreds of communities and villages will be absolutely ruined. It is a question of vital importance to my people, and I urge you to withhold the destroying hand.

The great majority of these people are Republicans. They have followed the fortunes of the party through evil as well as through good report. They do not deserve the chastisement you now propose to heap upon them. They do not deserve the maelstrom of ruin which this bill will bring to their doors.

Loyalty to a great idea is poorly repaid when men in high places abandon that idea at crucial points. Integrity of political purpose can not be expected when its leaders abandon the purpose and drift aimlessly upon an experimental sea. Continued dominance of Republican ideas can not be expected when Republican leaders join hands with Democratic thought and tear down American enterprises built at the call of Republican thought. If we are Republicans, let us be loyal to the traditions of the party and vote down this insidious bill, which, as certainly as the change of seasons, will disrupt and destroy the Republican organization.

The measure under consideration is unjust to the wood-alcohol interests of the land; it injures labor and destroys industry. It offers nothing but a delusive hope, and is not demanded by the great mass of the American people. A sentiment manufactured by a bureau in New York asks for its enactment, and outside the pale of this manufactured sentiment there is no demand for the bill.

It injures the people of my district and the people of many other districts in several States. It is in violation of Republican thought, Republican traditions, and Republican ideals, and I hope it will be overwhelmingly defeated.

As a Republican, I am utterly opposed to a reduction of one iota of the Government's receipts. This bill will strike down from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000 of the annual revenues of the Government, and I am opposed to any reduction whatever.

I shall oppose revenue reduction of any kind so long as a single city, town, or hamlet of 4,000 inhabitants is without a Federal building.

I shall continue this opposition until every river and harbor of our land has been so improved by the Government of the United States as to make it a source of pride to all the people and a source of wealth to the entire country.

And were it possible to apply the national revenue to the purpose, I should oppose this reduction until every country road from Maine to California, and from Kalamazoo to Galveston had felt the effect of the Government's revivifying hand.

We have no revenue to spare. This is no time for a reduction, and were it so, this is not the industry to be sacrificed.

I urge my friends to vote against this bill. [Applause.]

I subjoin a table of statistical information and clippings which will further illustrate the fallacies in the arguments of those who favor the passage of the bill.

ALCOHOL OF NO USE FOR AUTOMOBILES.

The Engineer, one of the leading technical journals of England, in commenting on the recent results of trials in France of alcohol as a substitute for gasoline in automobile running says:

One of the most noteworthy things to be recorded in connection with the French automobile industry during the past year is the failure of alcohol to come up to the expectations that were formed of it a twelvemonth ago. Makers of motor vehicles, with the exception of two or three have never shown much enthusiasm for the new spirit. They have been ready enough to run vehicles with alcohol in competition held in the interest of this fuel, because they have felt it their duty to support what is regarded as a national movement, yet, despite the incessant encouragement of the Government, the use of alcohol in this direction has not materially increased. As a fuel, it is fairly satisfactory, but in all cases the consumption is so high that it can only be economically employed in countries where the product is cheap and petroleum practically prohibited.

THE WARNING OF A CHEMIST.

It would have been easy for us to fill this committee room with thoughtful, earnest men engaged in the manufacture of charcoal, acetate of lime, wood alcohol, charcoal iron, varnish, lumber, etc., all eager to protest against the ruination of their business for the purpose of giving an additional profit to a few manufacturers already prosperous; to protest against aiding the grain distillers, who already have a monopoly. But I am satisfied that this committee will find the country is not ready for tax-free alcohol; that it can not compete with petroleum distillates for heat, light, and power purposes, and that its use in other directions will simply be to displace wood alcohol with material benefit to the manufacturers of grain alcohol, but to only a few others.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for general leave to print on this subject for five legislative days, the speeches to be confined to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who desire to do so may have leave to print remarks on this bill for five legislative days, including to-day. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirteen minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield ten minutes of that time to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to consume any of the time. (The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] seems not to understand the difference between two quite distinct things. One is untaxing a producer for the benefit of that producer and all consumers, and the other is taxing all consumers for the benefit of some producers. That old sophism, which he has indulged in to-day—of setting up as a "vested right" some existing wrong, and then asking men not to interfere with it "out of pity," is a thing that never appealed much to my judgment and I am therefore very strenuously in favor of the passage of this bill.)

I now yield four and a half minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, in the time alloted for this debate it would be impossible for me to fairly discuss the merits of this bill, but I consider it one of the best bills that has ever come before this House since I have been a Member of it, so far as the people of the United States are concerned. I was surprised at the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] as to the way he treated this bill. One would suppose that this was a measure to impose a tax for the benefit of some particular manufacturing interest. As a matter of fact, it is a bill to remove a tax from a commodity that has a greater use in the manufactures, arts, and sciences of the world than any other commodity that we have. The object of taxation, to those who believe with us on this side of the House, should be solely for the purpose of revenue; but I take it that to all the Members of this House there can be but a few, if any, that disagree to the proposition that the levy of internal-revenue taxation should only be for the purpose of raising revenue and for no other purpose.

Now, the Government of the United States, like all other civilized governments, raises a large portion of its taxes from a tax levied on whisky and spirits. It is intended to raise the tax from that commodity. It was never intended when taxation was inaugurated that it should interfere with alcohol in the arts and sciences, but incidentally it had to do it. It was not the intention to debar the people of the United States from the use of alcohol in the arts, it was merely to levy a tax on alcohol as a revenue. For many years it was supposed that we could not remove the tax on alcohol for the arts and manufactures without injuring the revenue of the country. But the great civilized nations of the world—Germany, England, and France—have denaturized alcohol and allowed it to be used in the arts for many years, and have demonstrated that this has been done without interfering with the revenues of the government and without allowing the denaturized alcohol to be used as a beverage.

The sole object of this bill or the only purpose of this bill is to so denaturize alcohol for the use in the arts—for light, fuel, and heat—that the people of the country may have that great benefit and that that great boon may be conferred upon them without paying the tax.

The gentleman from Michigan indicted the Ways and Means Committee for not putting a tax on denaturized alcohol of 5 cents a gallon for the purpose of inspection. Your committee after a full and fair investigation in this matter found that if we put a tax of 5 cents a gallon on denaturized alcohol we would make the cost so high of fuel and light and heat that it would not be able to compete with kerosene or be used for light and for heat. Therefore your committee believed that it was our duty to the people of the country and to the people who needed free alcohol for industrial purposes, for light, for the farm home, running the farm engine, taking care of the industrial business of the farm, to give them alcohol that was absolutely free. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield four and a half minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the proposition to remove the tax from denatured grain alcohol for technical uses is the only one of which history furnishes an authentic record on which distillers and prohibitionists, manufacturers and farmers, producers and consumers are agreed.

If the roseate predictions of its most optimistic advocates are fulfilled, we will witness a veritable Aladdin's lamp working its myriad wonders before our eyes in this prosaic age. If even half of them are realized, we will see a revolution in lighting, heating, manufacturing, and motors.

Buckle, in his immortal fragment, says that the three most potent factors in modern civilization were the invention of gunpowder, the invention of movable types, and the use of steam as a motor and a manufacturing agent. Had he lived in our day he would have classed electricity as the fourth. If the hopes of the proponents of untaxed denatured alcohol find fruition in fact, then it will rank as the fifth.

It is said that he who causes two blades of grass to grow where only one grew before is a public benefactor. If that be true—and it certainly is incontrovertible—then the declaration may be made without fear of successful contradiction that he is also a public benefactor who furnishes cheap light, cheap fuel, and a cheap motive power to the masses of the people. These are among the blessings promised by this measure. Every Member of this House can enroll himself among his country's benefactors by voting for this bill. A cordial invitation is hereby extended to all Members to place their names upon the roll of honor.

In passing, it may be well to state that this is the only civilized country under the sun in which any considerable tax is levied upon denatured alcohol intended for technical uses. In this age of fierce industrial and commercial competition—constantly growing fiercer—we can not afford to neglect any of the natural advantages which we possess; and as alcohol can be made from anything containing starch or sugar—grain of every sort, white potatoes, sweet potatoes, yams, waste molasses (both cane and beet), cornstalks, etc.—we can easily and profitably produce substances from which a limitless quantity of alcohol can be made.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the gentleman how much this reduces the revenue?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I doubt very much whether this will reduce the revenue a dollar.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What is the apparent reduction?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The apparent reduction varies all the way from about half a million to ten millions of dollars, owing to who is doing the calculating. [Laughter.]

It is not the part of wisdom to agree with the extremists on this subject, either pro or con.

One set seem to think that untaxed alcohol will usher in the millennium; the other set conclude that it will destroy the wood-alcohol and the charcoal iron industry. The former are unduly elated, the latter are unnecessarily scared.

Alcohol can be made from the cornstalks which we produce and waste in quantities to supply not America only, but the world with cheaper and better light and fuel. Alcohol, however, will not be made from cornstalks in any considerable quantities, so long as grain and potatoes are as cheap as they now are. So far from the wood-alcohol industry being destroyed, it is doubtful if it will be injured to any appreciable degree. Indeed, some persons think it would help it, for the best denaturing material thus far discovered is one-tenth part of wood alcohol.

Last year the entire output of wood alcohol was about 9,000,000 gallons. The enthusiastic proponents of the pending measure predict that in a short time we will be consuming 200,000,000 gallons of denatured alcohol per annum. That would necessitate the use of 20,000,000 gallons of wood alcohol per annum for denaturing purposes alone, or twice our entire present output of wood alcohol.

Now, be it remembered that nobody starts out to make wood alcohol as an original proposition. It is a by-product of charcoal burning, wood alcohol and acetate of lime constituting 52 per cent of the money value of charcoal making.

On the other hand, what is called "grain alcohol" is the principal product of distillation, except the slops, which, as animal food, just about pay the cost of distillation, which is one of the simplest processes known among men.

That free denatured alcohol will be a powerful competitor with the Standard Oil trust and the coal trust there can be no question, and for that reason, if for no other, this bill should be enacted into law. It can be made in this country for from 15 to 30 cents per gallon, at which price it is cheaper than kerosene or gasoline, for a gallon of alcohol contains about twice as many heat units as a gallon of kerosene or gasoline. At the same time it is much cleaner and safer. Why, then, refuse it to the people?

Aside from its use for lighting, heating, and motor purposes, it is surprising in what variety of manufactures it is a valuable, a necessary factor.

In an elaborate report Senator Platt and Mr. Russell enumerate the following:

Acids, bicycles, blacking, brass work, bronze work, burial caskets, cabinetmaking, carriages, cars, wagons, etc., cartridges, celluloid and zylonite chairs, chemicals, chemical preparations, cigars, colors, dental goods, desks, dyes, dyes used in textiles, enameled ware, flavoring extracts, folding beds, fulminating powder, furniture, gas and electric fixtures, gilding, granite ware, guns and pistols, hats, japanned ware, machinery, moldings, organs, paints, paper, pharmaceuticals, photographic materials, pianos, picture frames, rattan goods, shellac, silk, silver plating, smokeless powder, tobacco, toys, varnishes, whips.

There are, perhaps, others. The number is certain to increase rather than diminish.

By reason of the exorbitant price at which grain alcohol is now sold—about $2.40 per gallon—many manufacturers use wood alcohol, a deadly poison, which they can procure at about 70 cents per gallon, and which does not cost the producer over 30 cents per gallon.

Because denatured alcohol would be cheaper than wood alcohol, and because it is less deleterious in the use, both the manufacturers and their employees are clamorous for the passage of this bill.

The people of the Mississippi Valley want it because they will both produce it and use it. They know that there is much of profit and of comfort in it to them.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY].

Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, the United States is the only great manufacturing and commercial country in the world that makes no distinction between alcohol used for industrial purposes and distilled spirits intended for drinking. In this country both are classed as distilled spirits for taxation purposes. The internal-revenue tax on proof alcohol 50 per cent strong is $1.10 per gallon, equivalent to about $2.07 per gallon on commercial alcohol 94 per cent strong.

Alcohol can be cheaply produced, the cost of production under present conditions with the tax removed being estimated at from 10 to 25 cents per gallon testing 94 per cent.

For nearly twenty years propositions to remove the internal-revenue tax on alcohol for use in the arts and for fuel, light, and power have from time to time been brought to the attention of Congress by bill or otherwise. But for a variety of reasons these propositions have never before been favorably acted on. Two or three difficulties have heretofore been regarded as insurmountable and have prevented favorable action.

In the first place, many good people honestly thought that the removal of the tax would render alcohol so cheap that there would be a very marked increase in drunkenness. In the second place, it was feared by Congress that the removal of the tax would seriously affect the revenues of the Government. And in the third place, it was feared that the removal of the tax on the alcohol used in the arts and industries would open a door for fraud on the Government as to the alcohol used for drinking purposes.

But appreciation of the importance of solving the problem of cheap alcohol for commercial purposes has been growing, and a great deal of thought has, during recent years especially, been given to the problem. It is not surprising, therefore, that even a larger number than usual of bills for the removal of the tax on industrial alcohol have been introduced at this session of Congress.

The Committee on Ways and Means has given the subject very careful investigation this winter, and has framed a bill—the one now pending—that is believed to meet all the legitimate objections heretofore raised. This bill has the indorsement of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, of the Secretary of the Treasury, and of the President.

The objections of the temperance people have been met by the provision that the removal of the tax shall apply only to alcohol that has been "denaturized" under governmental supervision—that is, only to alcohol that has been rendered unfit for drinking purposes. And full protection for the revenues is believed to be provided in the bill.

In fact, the objections heretofore raised against this proposition—that is, the legitimate objections based on the public interest, though not those based on private interests—are so fully met in the pending bill that it seems likely that this bill will pass the House practically without dissent. And it is hoped that, notwithstanding the opposition of certain powerful interests, it will pass the Senate also at this session, or at least within the life of the Fifty-ninth Congress.

WHY THIS LEGISLATION?

And now what is to be gained through such legislation? One of the best brief answers to this question that I have seen is given in a letter that I recently received from one of the leading business men of my home city, Mr. W. L. Hixon, president of the Mankato Mills Company, manufacturers of wool hosiery, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the letter will be read.

[After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

MANKATO MILLS COMPANY,
Mankato, Minn., April 4, 1906.

Hon. J. T. McCLEARY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This is to advise you that we are strongly in favor of the bill at the present time before the House for the removal of the tax from commercial alcohol, or alcohol used in the arts.

Removal of this tax will have a far-reaching effect that those who are not in touch with industries where alcohol is used do not realize. I might suggest, for instance, that alcohol is used in large quantities in the manufacture of dyestuffs and chemicals, which it is impossible to manufacture in this country at the present time, owing to the enormous tax on alcohol.

Has it ever occurred to you to inquire why, in spite of the fact that there is a duty as high as 30 per cent on certain coal-tar dyestuffs, imported mostly from Germany, there has been no industry to speak of built up in this country for the manufacture of those products, which are almost exclusively imported from Germany to this country, the industry being an enormous one, amounting to millions of dollars? Ordinarily it would pay the German manufacturers to establish factories on this side of the Atlantic, in order to save transportation and the duty. It has been tried in a small way, but has failed, owing to the fact that the enormous tax on alcohol has prevented the making of certain chemicals and dyes, which could easily be made in this country were that tax removed, and which would undoubtedly develop a very large industry in this country if the tax were removed.

I might cite the fact that on aniline salt there is no duty at all, and I venture to say that 95 per cent of the aniline salt in this country has to be imported, as it has been found unprofitable to make it in this country, and there are only three manufacturers of that article in this country to-day, although it is used in enormous quantities, aniline salt being the basis of black dyes, paints, etc.

Outside of the benefit that the removal of the tax on alcohol would have in the above respect, it would undoubtedly develop into something that would give your farmer friends a cheaper fuel, and it would develop and build up an industry which amounts at the present time to little or nothing.

Yours, very truly,

MANKATO MILLS CO.,
W. L. HIXON, President.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, in another letter, a week later, Mr. Hixon elaborated his views on the subject still further, saying:

* * * * * * *

I have digressed from the subject I started to write you about, and in reference to it will say that the removal of the tax on alcohol would admit of the farmers, if they saw fit, distilling their own alcohol for fuel purposes, or placing it upon the market in its denaturized condition. It would build up another industry for them, and the enormously increased demand would produce an equal enormous increase in production, which would employ labor and be remunerative.

I believe it would ultimately make alcohol cheaper than either gasoline or kerosene by actual test, and those are now articles of household necessity.

As to the effect it will have on the manufacture of chemicals: Alcohol is a necessary solvent—in fact, the only real solvent. I might, among other chemicals, point out that ether, which is largely used in surgical operations, is in enormous consumption in this country. I have heard it said that one hospital alone in a certain city has used as high as 2,500 pounds per year. The price of ether in this country, I believe, is about 70 cents per pound, whereas in Germany, I am informed, it is about 7½ cents, the difference being entirely due to the fact that Germany levies no internal tax on denaturized alcohol. Furthermore, owing to the tax on alcohol a number of articles, including chemicals, can not be manufactured here at all. I am informed, too, that fulminating powders and fulminates, which are employed in charging percussion caps, friction primers, and fixed ammunition, without which neither dynamite nor modern smokeless powder could be fired, all come under this head, and these articles, I believe, have a direct bearing on the interests of the Government itself in the purchase of its materials for war.

I am told there are many ways of denaturizing alcohol in Germany for uses in the various industries; different methods are employed to fit the different cases. Therefore I would urge that the bill before Congress should not confine denaturizing alcohol to any one process or method.

All of this information I have picked up in the course of my own business, and without any special attempt to make a study of the matter.

I started out to write a few lines to you, and I have written a volume, but my interest in the subject, I hope, is a sufficient apology.

With kind regards, I remain,

Yours, very truly,

W. L. HIXON.

Mr. Hixon is a practical and successful business man, and his views are entitled to great consideration.

AMERICAN WORK SHOULD BE DONE IN AMERICA.

Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe that so far as possible the work of America should be done by the sons and daughters of America. And I believe that the passage of this bill will help in that direction. Of the many illustrations that might be given, I shall choose that of fulminate of mercury, the fulminating powder used as the explosive agent in percussion caps and cartridges of all kinds, referred to by Mr. Hixon.

Practically all the fulminating powder used in this country is made in Canada, the alcohol required being shipped from this country in bond, without payment of tax, and used in bonded manufacturing warehouses in the production of the fulminate. This is exported from Canada to the United States, paying the customs duty of 30 per cent ad valorem, which is considerably less than the internal-revenue tax on the alcohol used.

One result, therefore, of the present policy of taxing industrial alcohol is to give employment to Canadian instead of American workmen, and to prevent the development in this country of an important industry.

Mr. Hixon referred to another industry, that of dye making, which does not thrive here chiefly because of the high cost of alcohol. For these dyes we are now dependent on Germany, that empire whose people have, through wonderfully high technical skill, done so much to overcome the lack of natural resources in their country. But with "free alcohol" it is believed that we could supply ourselves with these dyes, thus again building up industries here and securing the work of our country to our own people.

It is claimed that 10,000 factories, representing 30 distinct industries, with an aggregate capital exceeding $500,000,000 and employing 300,000 hands, use alcohol, or a solvent derived from alcohol or an inferior substitute, as a raw material of manufacture. In all these factories cost of production is greatly and unnecessarily increased by the tax on alcohol. In some it is claimed that the cost is more than doubled. With "free alcohol" we shall have in all those lines cheaper production and a larger use of the products, resulting in increased employment of men, and greater enjoyment of the comforts of life by the people. It is believed that there would be a great expansion in the present industries using alcohol or substitutes for it, and the development of many new industries now unknown and undreamed of.

ALCOHOL FOR LIGHTING.

Alcohol burns readily under all conditions, without smoking, and is free from disagreeable odors. Its flame is nonluminous, but with a chemical mantle, similar to the Welsbach burner, it produces a very bright light. This was demonstrated to the Committee on Ways and Means during the hearings on the bill. And this light is very inexpensive. It is claimed that with free alcohol the cost per burner per hour for 71 candlepower will be only 1 cent. The light is pure white and very brilliant. Colors are said to be almost as readily distinguishable as by daylight. The light does not flicker and is not affected by drafts. Owing to this great steadiness, the alcohol light is said to be but little fatiguing to the eyes.

Careful tests show that a gallon of alcohol has twice the illuminating power of a gallon of kerosene. For illuminating purposes alcohol is claimed to be superior to kerosene in every way, being cleaner, safer, and better smelling. It never smokes, so chimneys keep clean and transparent. There is but little heat given off, the heat of combustion being converted into light by the mantle. The wick does not char nor gum up, and therefore it does not require trimming every day.

ALCOHOL FOR COOKING AND HEATING.

It is believed that with the removal of the tax on denaturized alcohol a great step onward in the solution of the problem of cheap fuel will have been taken. The importance of this to the people of the country, especially to those living on the prairies of the Middle West, can hardly be overestimated. The high price of coal or wood or other fuel would then, it is believed, have fewer terrors to the people.

As is well known, the chief element in the cost of coal to consumers at a distance from the mines is necessarily in the transportation. With "free denaturized alcohol" this large element of the cost of fuel can be largely removed, because fuel can then be produced near the place where it is consumed.

And what a boon to the housewife this cheap and clean fuel will be! The general use of alcohol in the household for fuel purposes would remove many of the annoyances of housekeeping. Think of freedom from ashes and dust. Think of the ease of starting the fire and the promptness with which it can be extinguished, and what this means in the summer time. Think of the nonsmoking and odorless flame for broiling, and the uniform temperature that can be maintained in all cooking operations.

ALCOHOL AS A MOTOR FUEL.

Alcohol is claimed to be not only a decidedly satisfactory substitute for gasoline as a motor fuel, but to be superior to it in many particulars. It is clean, odorless, and free from danger of accidental explosion. The vapor given off is not inflammable unless closely confined, and naked lights may be used around the machine without danger.

Concerning the industrial uses of alcohol in Germany, Frank H. Mason, until recently United States consul-general at Berlin, reported as follows:

At its present price of 15 marks per hectoliter (about 13 cents per gallon) it competes economically with steam and all other forms of motive energy in engines of less than 20 horsepower for thrashing, pumping, and all other kinds of farm work, so that a large percentage of the spirit produced in agricultural regions remote from coal fields is consumed in the district where it is grown. The motor for farm use is tightly inclosed and absolutely free from danger of fire.

Since the inception of this movement it has been a point of extreme importance to replace the steam engines for thrashing, grinding, fuel cutting, and other agricultural purposes with alcohol motors, for which are claimed the important advantages of immediate readiness for operation, freedom from danger of fire, and, finally, greater economy of maintenance.

Another important advantage of alcohol, which applies specially to its use in motor carriages and in engines for operating creameries and small manufacturing plants in premises adjacent to dwellings, is its absolute cleanliness and freedom from the mephitic odors which render hydrocarbon engines so offensive to many people.

THE FARMERS' INTEREST IN FREE ALCOHOL.

One of the great problems in every productive industry is to find a steady market for the entire product. This is true of farming as of every other industry. With our vast area of low-priced lands and the enormous development of our agricultural areas, it is a marvel that we have been able to find a market for the gigantic crops of our farms. We could not have come anywhere near doing so had it not been for the enormous growth of our manufacturing industries, furnishing here at home the best market for farm products in the entire world.

But even under our splendid system there has generally been a surplus, great or small, of certain of our farm products. For a year or so efforts have been made to scare our farmers at the prospective loss of the German market through hostile tariff legislation in that country. But that danger has been passed and is hardly likely to appear again except as a threat to compel us to give away a part of that great market of ours. There is good reason for believing that a domestic market for a much larger quantity of farm products than are now exported to Germany will be found through the enactment of the pending bill for removing the internal-revenue tax from industrial alcohol.

What the farmer wants is a market for his corn, potatoes, and so on. And if he can secure this market at home it is manifestly to his advantage to do so. Prices in foreign markets are, to some extent, affected by the competition of India, Australia, Argentina, Russia, and other countries. The creation of a permanently enlarged home market for corn, potatoes, and other farm products would to a great extent make our farmers independent of price fluctuations consequent on large crops in competing countries.

Moreover, from the standpoint of a wise domestic economy, there can be no question that it is better to keep the bulky farm products in this country than to ship them abroad, because if utilized in this country these products are returned to enrich the soil, while if they are exported they constitute a continual drain on the productivity of our land.

With the enormous development in the uses of alcohol in the industrial arts, in its uses as power for motors, boats, and farm engines, and in its uses for heating and lighting, it is claimed by men presumed to be well informed that there will soon, if the tax is removed, be a demand for hundreds of millions of gallons of denaturized alcohol. Translated into the terms of materials from which alcohol is produced, this would mean a new domestic market for immense quantities of farm products, with consequent benefits to our agricultural interests.

Representing an agricultural district, it is both my duty and my pleasure to support the pending bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, in the two minutes remaining to me I want to say that we did not put a tax of 5 cents a gallon or any other tax on denatured alcohol, because we wanted the fullest opportunity for use in this country, both in the interests of the people who would use it for fuel and light, and in the interest of the wood-alcohol manufacturers. It will not detract from the revenue, because it was conceded by the wood alcohol men, as well as by the others that appeared before the committee, that no ethyl alcohol was used now in manufacture or in the arts. It has been displaced completely by wood alcohol. We do not fear fraud upon the revenues, because we have permitted the use of alcohol in many liquid medical compounds, and the Secretary of the Treasury and also the Commissioner of Internal Revenue united in the opinion that they can guard against fraud on the revenue. What else I wish to say in reply to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] I will put in the record.

Mr. Speaker, I now ask for a vote; and in order to get a rising vote, I ask for a division.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD with form of petition generally signed by farmers, organizations, and Grange associations throughout the State of Michigan in favor of this measure. The signatures attached to this petition approximate 5,000 names, and read as follows:

MICHIGAN PATRON FREE-ALCOHOL PETITION.

To the honorable House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Your attention is respectfully asked to the urgent necessity which now exists for the enactment of such legislation by Congress as will enable the farmers of the United States to use untaxed denaturized alcohol as a motor fuel in farm engines and for heating, lighting, and cooking purposes.

Gasoline, which is now the only available fuel for the internal combustion engine, has more than doubled in price during the past few years, and since, owing to the largely increased use of this class of engines for farm work, the demand for gasoline is rapidly exceeding the supply, the necessity for securing a cheap, satisfactory, and permanent supply of fuel has become a very serious question.

Alcohol, distilled from corn and other farm products, which has been rendered undrinkable by the admixture of some poisonous substance, is the only fuel which meets all these conditions. A fire started with alcohol is one of the easiest to extinguish, owing to the fact that it mixes freely with water. Alcohol is clean and free from disagreeable odor and danger of accidental explosion, and when burned with an incandescent mantle gives a brilliant, steady, white light. The alcohol lamp with mantle is simple and inexpensive, and would be cheaper than other forms of lighting now in use on American farms if no tax was imposed on industrial alcohol.

The production of the enormous quantity of alcohol that would be used if the tax were removed would create a new market for surplus crops of corn, potatoes, or the waste products of the beet and cane sugar industries, etc. Tax-free alcohol would give the farmer a sort of balance wheel by providing a market for crops not otherwise marketable, since a crop partly spoiled could be made the source of cheap alcohol for industrial purposes, and the loss to the farmers from low-priced crops would be largely compensated for by the low cost of the alcohol fuel made therefrom.

The revenue laws of all other commercial nations, including Great Britain, Germany, France, Austria-Hungary, Italy, Belgium, Holland, Russia, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Cuba, Venezuela, Brazil, Argentine Republic, Chile, and Peru, provide that no tax shall be imposed on alcohol intended for industrial purposes, and as the enactment of similar legislation would directly benefit every farmer in the United States, Congress should take such action at the earliest possible date.

Respectfully,

M. H. Foster, Wm. S. Moffitt, Mrs. H. Jones, Mrs. J. Spencer, E. E. Moffitt, James Howard, James Spencer, Jennie Howard, Harmon J. Bailey, Hiram P. Jones, Mrs. M. H. Foster, Mrs. M. N. Sturgis, Vesta A. Sturgis, Stanley Sturgis, Jno. Moffitt, Myrtle Moffitt, Eula Moffitt, Rockford, Mich.

The SPEAKER. As many as are in favor of suspending the rules and passing the bill with the amendments will rise and remain standing until counted. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-two gentlemen have arisen in the affirmative. The ayes will be seated, and those who are opposed will rise and remain standing until counted. [After counting.] Seven gentlemen have voted in the negative. Upon this question the ayes are 222 and the noes 7.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor of the measure) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I present the report of the conference committee on the bill (H. R. 13103) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions, and ask that it be printed under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan presents the report of the conference committee on the pension appropriation bill for printing under the rules. It will be printed.

DAMS ACROSS BRANCHES OF ROCK RIVER, ETC.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14508) permitting the building of dams across any or all of the branches of Rock River, also a dam across the cut-off between Vandruffs Island and Carrs Island at, near, or upon the lower rapids of Rock River, in Rock Island County, Ill., which I send to the desk, and I ask unanimous consent that the amendment in the nature of a substitute be read instead of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill which he sends to the desk and for the reading of the amendment in the nature of a substitute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the amendment in the nature of a substitute, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to Samuel S. Davis, of the city of Rock Island, in the county of Rock Island and State of Illinois, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, to build, operate, and maintain dams across any or all of the branches or channels of the Rock River, including a dam across the chute or cut-off between Vandruffs Island and Carrs Island at, near, or upon the lower rapids of said Rock River, in said county of Rock Island, State of Illinois, for the development of water power, together with such works and structures in connection therewith as may be necessary or convenient in the development of said power and the utilization of the power thereby developed; said dams may be built at or near the sites of the dams formerly existing across said branches and said cut-off, or at any place or places between said sites and the dams now constructed at or near the head of said Carrs Island for the purposes of the Illinois and Mississippi Canal, and the said Samuel S. Davis, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns are hereby authorized and empowered to draw and divert by canal, flume, or race, or canals, flumes, and races, from the pool formed by the construction of said dams and works incident thereto, such supply of water as may be required for the full and complete development and utilization of said water power, and to discharge the same into said Rock River or some branch or channel thereof at or near the lower part of said Vandruffs Island, or at some place or places on or near the north shore of said river or of the north branch or channel thereof opposite to or below said Vandruffs Island; and also for that purpose to construct, operate, and maintain such structures and improvements as may be necessary or convenient: Provided, That such dams shall not be built or commenced until the plans and specifications for their construction, together with such drawings of the proposed construction and such map of the proposed locations as may be required for a full understanding of the subject, have been submitted to the Secretary of War for his approval, or until he shall have approved such plans and specifications and the location of such dams and accessory works; and when the plans for any dam to be constructed under the provisions of this act have been approved by the Secretary of War it shall not be lawful to deviate from such plans, either before or after completion of the structure, unless the modification of such plans has previously been submitted to and received the approval of the Secretary of War: Provided, That in approving said plans and locations such conditions and stipulations may be imposed as the Secretary of War may deem necessary to protect the present and future interests of the United States, which may include the condition that said Samuel S. Davis, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, shall construct, maintain, and operate, without expense to the United States, in connection with said dams and appurtenant works, a lock or locks, booms, sluices, or any other structures which the Secretary of War at any time may deem necessary in the interest of navigation, in accordance with such plans as he may approve, and also that whenever Congress shall authorize the construction of a lock or other structures for navigation purposes in connection with such dams, the person owning such dams shall convey to the United States, free of cost, title to such land as may be required for such constructions and approaches, and shall grant to the United States a free use of water power for building and operating such constructions: And provided further, That suitable fishways shall be constructed and maintained in said dams by said Samuel S. Davis, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, at his or their own expense, as may be required from time to time by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor: And provided further, That said dams and other structures shall be so constructed as in the judgment of the Secretary of War not to interfere with the Illinois and Mississippi Canal and the operation thereof, and the Secretary of War shall at any time control said dams so far as shall be necessary for the purposes of said last above-mentioned canal, but shall not destroy or impair the water power developed by said dams, canals, and appurtenant structures to a greater extent than shall be necessary to provide proper facilities for the navigation of said Illinois and Mississippi Canal or other purposes affecting navigation.

SEC. 2. That in case any litigation arises from the building, operation, and maintenance of said dams, canals, and appurtenant works, or from the obstruction of said river by the same, or any damages resulting to private property by overflow or otherwise, proceedings to adjust, determine, and recover compensation for such damages may be instituted in any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 3. That unless the actual construction of the dams herein authorized shall be commenced within one year and completed within three years after the passage of this act, the rights and privileges herein granted, so far as they pertain to the construction of any dam or dams not then completed, shall cease and determine.

SEC. 4. That the right to alter, amend, and repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendments offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1 change title to read: "Permitting the building of dams across the north and south branches of Rock River, adjacent to Vandruffs Island and Carrs Island and across the cut-off between said Islands, in Rock County Ill., in aid of navigation and for the development of water power."

On page 4 strike out lines 18, 19, 20, and line 21 to and including the words "Rock River" and insert "the north and the south branches or channels of Rock River, adjacent to Vandruffs Island and to Carrs Island and across the cut-off between said islands."

On page 4, line 22, after the word "Illinois," insert "in aid of navigation and."

On page 7, after line 14, insert "And the said Secretary of War may impose reasonable charges for the use of the flowage rights of the United States, if any, below the sites of the present Government dams at the head of said Carrs Island."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether he introduces this bill as a substitute?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. We have introduced a substitute as an amendment to the bill. There were a great many changes desired——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What was the number of the bill?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The same number—14508.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is the gentleman familiar with House bill 17878?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. What is the title?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. To incorporate the Rock River Navigation and Improvement Company.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to me? This is an entirely different measure from this. It has nothing to do with the other.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It has to do with the Rock River, and inasmuch as it flows through my district I desired to find out something about it.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. It has nothing to do with that bill at all.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understand it has nothing to do with it.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. No, sir.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MOUTH OF THE COLUMBIA RIVER.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 17987.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17987) making an appropriation for the improvement of the mouth of the Columbia River.

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $400,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, for continuing the improvement at the mouth of the Columbia River, Oregon and Washington, in accordance with the existing project.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Washington, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REGULATION OF SHIPPING IN THE PHILIPPINE ARCHIPELAGO, ETC.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18025) to regulate shipping in trade between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, between ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after April 11, 1909, no merchandise except supplies for the Army or Navy shall be transported by sea, under penalty of forfeiture thereof, between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, directly or via a foreign port, or for any part of the voyage, in any other vessel than a vessel of the United States. But this section shall not be construed to prohibit the sailing of any foreign vessel between any port of the United States and any port or place in the Philippine Archipelago: Provided, That no merchandise other than that imported in such vessel from some foreign port which has been specified on the manifest as for another port, and which shall not have been unloaded, shall be carried between a port of the United States and a port or place in the Philippine Archipelago.

SEC. 2. That on and after April 11, 1909, no foreign vessel shall transport passengers between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, either directly or by way of a foreign port, under a penalty of $200 for each passenger so transported and landed.

SEC. 3. That sections 1 and 2 of this act shall not apply to the transportation of merchandise or passengers between ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago. Until Congress shall have authorized the registry as vessels of the United States of vessels owned in the Philippine Archipelago the government of the Philippine Islands is hereby authorized to adopt, from time to time, and enforce regulations governing the transportation of merchandise and passengers between ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago.

SEC. 4. That sections 1 and 2 of this act shall not apply to the voyage of a vessel between a port or place in the Philippine Archipelago begun before April 11, 1909.

SEC. 5. That sections 1 and 2 of this act shall not apply to vessels owned by the United States.

SEC. 6. That on and after the passage of this act the same tonnage taxes shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all foreign vessels coming into the United States from the Philippine Archipelago which are required by law to be levied, collected, and paid upon vessels coming into the United States from foreign countries: Provided, however, That until April 11, 1909, the provisions of law restricting to vessels of the United States the transportation of passengers and merchandise directly or indirectly from one port of the United States to another port of the United States shall not be applicable to foreign vessels engaging in trade between the Philippine Archipelago and the United States: And provided further, That the Philippine Commission shall be authorized and empowered to issue licenses to engage in lighterage or other exclusively harbor business to vessels or other craft actually engaged in such business at the date of the passage of this act, and to vessels or other craft built in the Philippine Islands or in the United States and owned by citizens of the United States or by inhabitants of the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall, from time to time, issue regulations for the enforcement of this act, except as otherwise provided in section 3: Provided, That such of the navigation laws of the United States as are in force in the Philippine Archipelago in regard to vessels arriving in the Philippine Islands from the mainland territory and other insular possessions of the United States shall continue to be administered by the proper officials of the government of the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 8. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill at this time by unanimous consent?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I will have to object to unanimous consent.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Indiana is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Washington is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, the only effect of this bill is to postpone the time when the coastwise laws of the United States shall become applicable to the Philippine Archipelago. By an act of Congress approved on the 15th day of April, 1904, it was provided that on and after the 1st day of July, 1906, all of the commerce between the Philippine Archipelago and the United States should be conducted in American ships, that Philippine shipping from that time forward should be coastwise commerce. It was then hoped and expected on the part of the friends of the bill that the custom duties upon products shipped from the Philippine Islands to the United States would be very materially reduced if not altogether abolished. It was the hope and expectation also of those who supported the bill that American ship companies would provide themselves with adequate facilities to take care of the shipping trade between the United States and the archipelago. All of these hopes and expectations have been disappointed. The shipping trade of the Philippine Archipelago is comparatively small and inconsequential. It is conducted now as an incident to oriental trade in general, and ships of American register and foreign register, stopping at ports in the Philippine Islands, take on cargo, large and small, destined to the United States at convenient times. If this bill shall not be passed, and if the present law is permitted to stand, from the 1st day of July next all of that commerce must be conducted in American ships, and the result will be most disastrous to the prosperity of the archipelago. It is estimated by the Philippine Commission that the freights now paid upon their shipping will be increased at least 50 per cent. With 75 per cent of the Dingley duties upon products shipped from the Philippine Islands to this country, 50 per cent increase in their freight rates upon products shipped to this country, the archipelago will be positively at a disadvantage as compared with foreign countries. It would be better for the commercial interests of the archipelago if it were recognized entirely and altogether as foreign territory.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I remember, two years ago the question before the House, when the bill then pending was under consideration, was the alternative whether we would delay the enforcement of the coastwise laws until June, 1906, or until June, 1909. I would like to ask the gentleman whether there has been any developments in the shipping interests by reason of this law that was then enacted, providing for the enforcement of the coastwise laws in June, 1906?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the gentleman mean to inquire whether there has been any provision made to meet the requirements of the law?

Mr. STAFFORD. Whether there has been any extension in the shipping interests in view of giving to the American-made vessels a monopoly of the Philippine tariff?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think there has been none at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I would like to ask the gentleman whether he thinks that by postponing for three years, until April 11, 1909, there will be any additional American ships built by reason of that prospective monopoly we were going to create for the Philippine trade?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I hardly know how to answer that question, because any answer I could make would be purely conjectural. I believe this, that in the meantime we will probably abolish the custom duties upon Philippine products, and if we had free trade now with the islands they could probably get along if the coastwise laws applied to their shipping. But customs rates have not been reduced, and there seems to be no immediate prospect that they will be reduced.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the gentleman, then, that by reason of the reduction of the tariff upon Philippine imports the Philippine producers could afford to pay more for the freight, and thereby allow that to go into the hands of the ship-carrying trade?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. They would be in better condition. I do not know what the future may——

Mr. STAFFORD. To pay the higher, increased traffic?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not know what the future may develop in relation to the shipping industry. I do not know what legislation there may be.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, it is utterly impossible to hear.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, this bill is calculated to afford temporary relief in the hope that some permanent change in conditions for the betterment of the affairs of the Philippine Archipelago will take place during the next three years. The bill is recommended by the Philippine Commission and indorsed by the Secretary of War. I believe people who are at all acquainted with the affairs of the archipelago generally concur in the view that some relief of this character is imperatively required.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit me to make a statement?

Mr. COCKRAN. I would like to know what the character of the bill is.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have yielded to the gentleman from Wisconsin; I will answer the gentleman from New York in just a moment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to say I do not question the necessity at all of having some legislation to take down the bars so as to limit the effect of the bill we passed two years ago.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will say to the gentleman from New York the bill is to postpone the time when the coastwise laws of the United States will become operative upon the commerce of the Philippine Archipelago for about three years. I now reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would like to make an inquiry before the gentleman takes his seat. I would like to inquire whether the Secretary of War insists upon this amendment being taken up and acted upon now, as the gentleman understands it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, I do not know about that. I am not prepared to say what the Secretary of War is insisting on now. I insist that it should be taken up and acted upon and signed by the President before the 1st of next July; and if it is to be acted upon at this session of Congress it seems to me high time we were at it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will say for the information of the gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I want the gentleman to speak now in the time of the opposition. I understand he is opposed to the bill.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman from Washington will yield me five minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will say, for the benefit of the gentleman from Indiana, that there is now pending in Senate bill 529 a provision relating to the coastwise laws and their application to the Philippines. I do not know that I am violating any confidence when I say that that provision was introduced in that bill with the concurrence of gentlemen who are especially interested in the welfare of the Philippine Islands; and that provides for a subvention to American vessels engaged in the Philippine Islands trade until the coastwise laws apply, and it has been understood, or at least it was the expectation that this measure that is now taken up by my distinguished friend was not to receive action until that bill might be perhaps reported to the House, and the whole question considered together.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That provision of that bill to which the gentleman from Maine alludes is the measure commonly called the "ship-subsidy bill?"

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. So that in order to get this much relief in the interest of the Philippine Islands a Member of the House will be obliged to vote for the ship-subsidy bill? Is that the idea?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Not by any means.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How else could he get it?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. He could get it by the gentleman in charge of this bill now giving unanimous consent to put on this bill an amendment that will take care of American shipping during that period of time. It is precisely for that reason, Mr. Speaker, that I am now on my feet during these five minutes, explaining in a general way to my friend from Indiana just exactly what the situation is; and I now ask unanimous consent that I may introduce an amendment accomplishing that result.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would like to ask for unanimous consent for the introduction of an amendment providing for this subvention to American vessels engaged in the Philippine trade until the coastwise laws go into effect.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What was the purpose of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I was going to make the objection if the gentleman from Kentucky had not made it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. You were trying to get my consent so that you might object?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Oh, no.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I beg your pardon. Well, I presume it is impossible under the rule to get an amendment on this bill unless there is unanimous consent, and I understand my distinguished friend from Kentucky objects.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Oh, certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. And others would.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the situation upon which we are now acting came from the passage of a bill reported from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries in Congress two years ago. This bill comes now from the Committee on Insular Affairs. Its purport is simply and solely to affect the American merchant marine, and this is exclusively in the jurisdiction of that committee and exclusively out of the jurisdiction of the committee that has reported the bill. I am unable to talk, but want, if possible, to give the House a fact or two in connection with this legislation.

While the Taft party was in the Philippine Islands, at the request of Mr. Secretary Taft I undertook the labor of consulting all of the interests there and getting evidence as to the necessity of this or similar legislation. I held a good many interviews with the prominent business men of the place. I have not all of them here, but I have a large amount of very valuable testimony throwing light upon this whole question. I did not know that this bill had been introduced or carried to the Committee on Insular Affairs until it was reported back again; and while some members of the Taft party must have known of the deposit of this testimony in my possession, I have not been called upon or requested at any time to make it manifest, so that the great commercial bodies of Manila could be heard. I have in my possession the statement, very elaborate and very carefully prepared, of the United Chamber of Commerce of Manila and others, and, furthermore, the Shipowners' Association of the Philippine Islands in a subsequent statement.

Now, I think that it is due to myself, they depending upon me to present their view of this question, and having a right to depend upon me that I would do it, and I being wholly misled by reason of the fact that we were waiting for the action of the committee upon another bill, I think I ought at least to present this matter to the House, and at the close of my effort to speak, I will ask unanimous consent to put these statements of the parties interested into the RECORD, so that the public may know something of the real merits of this claim. It may be said that I should have raised the question of jurisdiction, and it could only have been decided in one way; but I did not know that this bill had been introduced. I know that it is probably the duty of a Congressman to read the RECORD every morning, to see what bills are introduced and where they go, but I do not always do that, and I confess that in the present emergency I was derelict in that particular. I therefore ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD the testimony that I hold in my hand.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to print the matters referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The testimony is as follows:

Report of the united Chambers of Commerce of Manila, Shipowners' Association of the Philippines, and others, to General GROSVENOR, chairman of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

MANILA, P. I., August 19, 1905.

Report submitted by the united Chambers of Commerce of Manila, the Shipowners' Association of the Philippines, and others, to General GROSVENOR, chairman of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, in response to his invitation of the 11th of August, requesting information, as follows:

"The effect of the Frye bill now passed into law to begin its operations next July.

"What will be the effect of this law upon the interests of the islands? Will there grow out of it probably a monopoly in trade that will be injurious to the producers here (in the Philippines)?"

The Frye bill, which is Senate Document No. 2259, passed the Senate of the United States and became a law on December 8, 1903. This law, unless repealed, will come into force on July 1, 1906. It provides that no merchandise shall be transported by sea under penalty of forfeiture thereof between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, directly, or via a foreign port, or for any part of the voyage, in any other vessel than a vessel of the United States. It further provides that no foreign vessel shall transport passengers between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, either directly or by way of a foreign port, under a penalty of $200 for each passenger so transported and landed.

The reason for the enacting of the Frye bill could only have been based on the necessity of protecting the United States flag with a view to building up its mercantile marine, the benefit of which would be derived entirely by the shipowners of the United States. To give this benefit to the shipowners of the United States, an advantage heretofore enjoyed by the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands in being able to get their products to the consuming markets through competition by the cheapest routes is to be taken away from them, or, to use plainer language, with no advantage given them to compensate them for the loss, they are to be exploited for the benefit of the shipowners of the United States.

These islands have fallen into a state of financial collapse, due to a seven years' war; rinderpest, which annihilated the draft animals, and consequent failure of crops. The country is therefore by no means in a condition to pay such tribute to the United States, but rather requires careful fostering until agriculture—the backbone of Philippine prosperity—is once more in a thriving condition and its finances again placed on a sound footing.

The Frye bill in its present state gives full license to any shipowners or combination of shipowners, commonly termed a "pool," to charge rates of freight and passage as high as the trade will stand. No subsidy is authorized to allow their cheapening rates of freight and passage, and no condition is made restricting them in the matter.

In the parallel case, where Spain imposed coastwise laws between the mother country and the Philippines, she subsidized a mail line and made it one of the conditions that the rates from any Spanish ports should in no case be higher than the current rates from Liverpool. By this provision Spain continually derived the benefit of the fluctuations of all the competing lines running to Great Britain, and thus minimized the evil effects of the law.

There exists in America a radical defect which militates very much against her being able to compete with other countries in the cheap transportation of freight and passengers. This lies in the cost of shipbuilding being fully 50 per cent above that of Europe and the wages of the officers and crew of an American ship being very much higher than those paid by all other countries. Add to this that these nonsubsidized American steamers have to compete against the heavily subsidized German, French, Japanese, Canadian, and other lines and the cheaply built and cheaply manned German, Norwegian, and British tramp steamers and it will be seen at a glance that American steamers are too heavily handicapped to be able to run at the same low rate of freight as these other vessels.

It therefore goes without saying that while when forced by open competition American vessels may keep the rates down to within reach of a competitive figure, they would immediately raise their rates to all that the trade would stand when protected by such a law as the Frye bill. This would mean that the price of hemp to the producer would go down in proportion as the rate of freight goes up. It would mean that our sugar, already handicapped by being so far away from the consuming markets, would certainly not go to the United States and that any concession in duties in favor of Philippine sugar for the benefit of the islands would in a great measure disappear into the pockets of the steamship companies. And it would mean the death stroke to the importation of American goods into these islands; or, if American goods were continued to be brought in, they could only do so, with any chance of competing with foreign goods, by the Frye bill being evaded as follows: By being brought through, or rather from, a Hongkong firm. Thus a Hongkong firm might import American goods in any bottoms to Hongkong, and a firm here could buy such goods and bring them into Manila in any bottom. This, of course, would mean a profit to the Hongkong firm, and, what is more serious, would mean a diversion of trade to the detriment of the port of Manila.

The transshipping expenses in Hongkong are only 75 centavos (37½ cents gold) per ton, and the freight from Hongkong to Manila is only a small proportion of the through freight. While a small amount of American goods might be imported either direct or by way of Hongkong, there is no doubt whatever that foreign goods, coming by the cheaper foreign lines and under an equal customs tariff, would command the market.

A good example of the effect of a difference in freight rates is given to-day in the case of flour imported into the Philippines. The freight rate from San Francisco is $5 per ton (United States currency). The freight rate from Australia is $3.75 per ton. In former days the San Francisco flour had sole command of the Philippine market, but, owing in great part to this difference in freight rates, the sale of Australian flour is increasing in the islands day by day. If such is the case to-day, when rates are open to competition, what will be the final result when the San Francisco rates are raised still further as an effect of the Frye bill?

It has been stated by those in favor of the Frye bill that there is sufficient tonnage to handle all the cargo between the Philippines and the United States, both ways, and this is probably very true, provided a sufficient number of the ocean-going vessels flying the American flag are dedicated to this trade; but one thing is to have sufficient tonnage to give proper service, and another thing is to have a sufficient surplus of such tonnage to compete for the trade and reduce freights to a reasonable rate.

It will be well to take warning from the object lesson of the Navy Department's effort of the other day to transport all of its coal to these Islands in American bottoms. After profusely advertising for bids, the Department was able to contract for transportation in American bottoms at nearly double foreign tonnage rates, but, for want of sufficient United States tonnage, was obliged, in the end, to transport a large portion in foreign bottoms.

The following paragraphs, taken from an article contributed by Col. H. B. McCoy, deputy collector of customs at Manila, to the Manila Bulletin, will be of interest as showing how the lower rates of freight by foreign bottoms (see tables of freight rates ruling at the present time appended hereto), and probably also the scarcity of competing American tonnage, has thrown the bulk of the carrying trade to the foreign bottoms:

"During the year 1904, 556 vessels, having a net registered tonnage of 1,005,488 tons, entered the port of Manila bringing freight aggregating 624,092 tons, valued at $25,949,208 gold. Of this import tonnage, 76,062 tons, valued at $4,916,543, was from the United States, and 2,525 tons, valued at $554,067, was from Hongkong. This Hongkong tonnage does not represent the quantity actually carried by the Hongkong-Manila steamers, as it does not include foreign transit cargo transshipped at that port for Manila and other Philippine ports. Of these vessels, 82, with a registered tonnage of 254,407 tons, were of American registry arriving from the United States, and 194, with a registered tonnage of 266,527 tons, were of foreign registry arriving from Hongkong. Of the import tonnage brought to Manila, merchandise to the value of $301,420 (a trifle over 1 per cent of the total) was carried in vessels of the Philippine Islands and consisted mainly of rice cargoes imported from Saigon.

"The export trade of the islands shows practically the same conditions and proportions. During the year there was exported from the port of Manila 162,404 tons of merchandise, valued at $22,562,402 gold. Of this, 49,554 tons, valued at $8,813,742, went to the United States, and 9,076 tons, valued at $1,192,292, went to Hongkong. Again, the Hongkong tonnage does not correctly represent the shipments to or through that port, as transit cargoes are not included therein. Of the total exports only $2,011,002 was carried in American bottoms and none in vessels of the Philippine Islands."

With regard to passengers, we consider that the enforcement of section 2 of the Frye bill would be a distinctly retrograde movement in these days when the way of the traveler should be rather made easier instead of more difficult. Besides the shadow of police surveillance, implied in the penalty of $200, the traveler is distinctly handicapped in the choice of routes and way ports, and such a thing as a 'round-the-world ticket would be entirely impossible. The result, again, would be to divert the passenger traffic by way of Hongkong.

In view of the foregoing reasons we can not too strongly impress upon you the urgent necessity of taking action to ask that the Frye bill be entirely revoked, and we sincerely trust that you will give our petition your able and hearty support.

Report of the Shipowners' Association of the Philippines to General GROSVENOR, chairman House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

MANILA, P. I., August 19, 1905.

Report submitted by the Shipowners' Association of the Philippines to General GROSVENOR, chairman of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, in response to his invitation of the 11th of August, requesting information as follows:

"It is desired to know the opinions of the men competent to state what ought to be done with the interisland traffic. Should the coastwise navigation laws of the United States be extended to this traffic? If not, what would be advisable for the improvement of this commerce? Furthermore, if the coastwise laws of the United States should be extended here (in the Philippine Islands), what ought to be done in regard to the vessels now carrying foreign flags in this trade?"

With regard to navigation laws to govern the interisland traffic we are perfectly satisfied with the manner of the present legislation, which is practically an extension of the coastwise navigation laws of the United States with modifications to suit local conditions. Section 73 of act 355 of the Philippine Commission reads:

"In the coasting trade the admeasurement, documenting, enrollment, and licensing of vessels built or owned in the Philippine Archipelago, and in the making and recording of all documents relating thereto, the insular collector shall observe, promulgate, and enforce such orders and regulations respecting the same as have been heretofore or shall hereafter be prescribed by the proper authority. In the absence of such regulations or orders he shall observe and follow the laws of the United States and the regulations of the Treasury Department of the United States so far as may be in his sound judgment applicable."

The conditions of the interisland trade are so entirely different from those obtaining in the United States or in any of its other possessions that we consider it absolutely necessary that the legislation governing same should be entirely separate and enacted to suit local conditions. This would in no way act to the prejudice of vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of any other American territory, as this local legislation would cease to be effective outside of the Philippine Islands, except in so far as regards the flag.

With regard to what would be advisable for the improvement of our commerce, we would cite that the establishment of a mail service by regularly scheduled routes, proposals for bids for which are out, to be opened on the 2d of January next, should bring the required improvements which will place the shipowners on a much more stable basis and give to the public and the Government a more efficient and satisfactory service. The other improvements that would aid in developing this commerce will, we are confident, in the able hands of the honorable Commission, come in time, and in such measure as the country can afford in the building of jetties and wharves and the dredging of rivers to provide a cheaper mode of loading and discharging cargo.

With regard to vessels now carrying foreign flags in this trade, we beg to state that there are none, as act 520, of the Philippine Commission, which temporarily allowed foreign vessels to enter into interisland trade, owing to a scarcity of tonnage caused by the quarantine regulations in force during the cholera epidemic of 1902–3, expired by time limit on the 1st of July, 1904.

With regard to legalizing the status of the vessels engaged in the interisland trade, section 3, of the Frye bill, says:

"Until Congress shall have authorized the registry as vessels of the United States of vessels owned in the Philippine Archipelago the government of the Philippine Islands is hereby authorized to adopt from time to time and enforce regulations governing the transportation of merchandise and passengers between ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago."

We think that the delay in so authorizing the registry is unjust to the local owners. The standing of the locally-owned vessels is as follows:

At the time of the taking of Manila, on the 13th of August, 1898, all the vessels engaged in the interisland trade of the Philippines were legally registered under the Spanish flag. As it was necessary to take immediate steps so that the interisland trade, interrupted since the battle of Cavite on May 1, 1898, should be resumed, an order was promulgated by the captain of the port, under date of August 30, 1898, by direction of the military governor, General Otis, the second paragraph of which provided that vessels registered as Spanish property be given a permit to carry the flag of the United States and, as such, entitled to protection as American property, etc.

No distinction was made as to whether the vessel making application for such protection was owned by a native of the islands, a Spaniard, or a foreigner. The point to be shown was proof beyond doubt that the vessel was registered as Spanish property.

This order was subsequently modified by Executive order of the 3d of July, 1899, which is embodied, with regulation governing same, in Tariff Circular 81, War Department, July 8, 1899. Most of this tariff circular is now embodied in the customs administrative act of February 6, 1902, No. 355, entitled, "An act to constitute the customs service of the Philippine Archipelago and to provide for the administration thereof."

Section 117 of this act reads as follows:

"Collectors of customs may issue a certificate of protection, entitling the vessel to which it is issued to the protection and flag of the United States in all ports and on the high seas if the vessel is owned by:

"(a) A citizen of the United States residing in the Philippine Islands;

"(b) A native inhabitant of the Philippine Islands upon taking the oath of allegiance to the United States;

"(c) A resident of the Philippine Islands before April 11, 1899, hitherto a subject of Spain, upon abjuring his allegiance to the Crown of Spain and taking the oath of allegiance to the United States."

However, by some oversight, no provision had been made for corporations or companies owning vessels and operating them under the Spanish flag and which were under their control on April 11, 1899. But this oversight was rectified by act 1235 on September 22, 1904, entitled "An act to amend act 355, known as the 'Philippines customs administrative act.'" Section 3 of this act amends section 117 of act 355 by making paragraph (a) read as follows:

"A citizen of the United States residing in the Philippine Islands or a corporation or company created under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof or of the Philippines: Provided, That any duly authorized officer of such corporation or company or the managing agent or the master of the vessel for which the license is sought resides in the Philippines."

Now, therefore, all of the vessels operating in the interisland trade at the present time are bona fide owned and duly registered under the laws at present in force. No doubt whatever exists in the minds of their owners as to their legal right to the protection of the United States flag for all time.

It has been the practice of the United States, in the case of accretions of territory to it, to provide for the registration, as vessels of the United States, of vessels owned by the subjects, citizens, or residents of the territory acquired, and, in the case of the Louisiana purchase, owned by citizens of the United States in the territory at that time.

On the accretion of the Territory of Hawaii all vessels carrying Hawaiian registers, and which were owned bona fide by citizens of the United States or by citizens of Hawaii, together with several other vessels claiming Hawaiian register, were registered as vessels of the United States.

On the accretion of the island of Porto Rico to the United States the Commissioner of Navigation was instructed to make such regulations, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, as he deemed expedient for the nationalization of all of the vessels owned by inhabitants of Porto Rico who then resided in the island or were deemed and held to be citizens of Porto Rico, except such as had elected to preserve their allegiance to the Crown of Spain on or before the 11th day of April, 1899.

It will thus be seen that on the accretion of the Territories aforementioned all their vessels were given the same rights as all other vessels of the United States proper, and therefore it would be clear discrimination against the Philippine Islands if the locally owned vessels were not given full American registry.

Besides the legal aspect of the question, it must not be forgotten that had the local vessels not been available for use the entire commerce of the islands and the transportation of troops and supplies for the United States Government would have been paralyzed at a most critical juncture.

We would beg here to give an illustration of the possible result of discrimination against the locally owned vessels if they were not given full American registry. For instance, the proposals are out for bids, to be opened on the 2d of January next, for the contract of the interisland mail service throughout the archipelago for a period of five years. Agents of local steamship companies of the Hawaiian Islands have been looking over the ground here with a view to bidding for this contract and entering into our interisland trade. As there is already a large surplus of steamers for the present trade of these islands, a great number now being tied up for want of employment, with the influx of six or seven steamers from the Hawaiian Islands, and perhaps a few more from the United States, the local owners would be practically forced to put their steamers on the limited market for China or Japan ports and thus sacrifice their boats at less than one-half of their original cost.

As the case now stands, our Philippine-owned vessels are entirely prohibited from entering into the coastwise trade of Hawaii, Porto Rico, or the United States, or being sold to any of their ports, while vessels from any or all of these ports may come in to swamp our already half-ruined local owners. Such a discrimination would be neither just nor equitable, and we are fully confident that when these facts are brought before Congress action will be immediately taken to give all locally owned vessels full American registry.

We therefore respectfully request that you lay our case clearly before Congress, ably, we know you will, and use your best endeavors to obtain a favorable legislation.

Respectfully,

JOHN T. MACLEOD,
Honorary Secretary of the Shipowners' Association of the Philippines.

We, the undersigned, do hereby indorse the foregoing report in all its parts.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I should like to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] whether, in case the tariff between this country and the Philippine Islands should be abolished, this bill makes any provision for the coastwise laws to go into effect before 1909?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; there is no provision of that kind in this bill. We thought the Philippine Archipelago could stand this bill, even though the tariff should be taken off.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I should like to ask the gentleman whether there were any hearings on this bill before his committee?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; there were no formal hearings. The committee were all fully advised in a general way of the needs of the Philippine Islands through the Commission and the Secretary of War. I think Secretary Taft, in a statement before the committee earlier in the session, discussed this question and emphasized the necessity of making a postponement, and not altogether repealing the law.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Was the gentleman's committee so well informed that it did not want to have any hearings or to give the shipowners or people immediately opposed to this matter any opportunity to appear before the committee?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We recognized the fact that there are limitations upon our information, and that we can be instructed, but we thought that primarily the welfare and interests of the Philippine Archipelago were involved. That was the primary consideration, and that we owed it to the archipelago to give them as free commerce under existing conditions as it was possible to do for at least three more years.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. May I ask the gentleman when the bill was introduced?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. April 11.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. When a similar bill was introduced before it went to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, did it not?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It went to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, I think improperly. I introduced the bill and indorsed it to the Committee on Insular Affairs. That bill was held up two or three days, and I insisted that it should go to the Committee on Insular Affairs. I think it should have gone there then, and I think that the present bill logically and properly went to that committee.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Of course it is too late to argue that question now. I want to make just one statement in reference to the inquiry that was propounded by the gentleman from Wisconsin. He wished to know whether or not there had been any shipping built under its terms, under the provision that the law was to go into effect in 1906. There is a very reasonable explanation, however, why no shipping has been built, because the statement was made here upon the floor of this House that when the time came for that law to go into effect the cordage trust of this country would be here asking that it be extended. Can you expect the shipowners of this country, when they were anticipating the very thing that has happened, to go to work and build ships for that trade?

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman mean to state that the bill we are now considering is the result of the efforts of the cordage trust?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not mean to state that it is the result of the cordage trust, but I say that the cordage trust has been urging this legislation, and I further state that it appeared before our committee urging this legislation. I further state that it is to the interest of the cordage trust that the hemp be carried by the ship combine formed by foreign ships by way of London to New York, instead of being brought to the Pacific ports by American ships.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is that the only article of Philippine growth affected by this bill?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman further acquainted with the representation made two years ago when a bill of a similar nature was under consideration, that it would be a great hardship to the Philippine producer when the coastwise laws took effect, without any additional American ships to render competition in freight traffic at all possible?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; I am well acquainted with that report, but I do not believe it is true. We had testimony before our committee that there was nothing in that statement whatever.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman think that freight can be carried as cheaply from the Philippines to American ports in American-made ships as in foreign-made vessels?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think the American vessels can carry hemp from Manila to the American coast as cheaply as a British vessel can carry it from Manila to London and from London to New York.

Mr. STAFFORD. I put the question to the gentleman whether the American-made ship can carry Philippine products as cheaply as a foreign-built ship?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is not a question of whether they can or not.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is my question.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is the gentleman's question, but I say that the American-built ship will carry the products from the Philippine Islands, if you will give them the opportunity to get that trade—the trade that the combine of foreign ships are now carrying.

Mr. STAFFORD. What prevents the American ships from having the advantage of getting that trade in competition with foreign-made ships?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If I had known that this bill was being considered in the committee I would have presented the facts in relation to it, and if I had known that it was coming up here to-day I would have been prepared to present them.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And that is a subject that has been before his committee only recently.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will answer the gentleman's question. The reason why American ships now can not get this trade is because there is a combination between foreign ships and foreign merchants at Manila which prevents it.

We had testimony before our committee a few days ago that an American shipowner went to Manila to get a cargo, and there was a combination between the British vessels and the foreign merchants that prevented him from getting a cargo at any price. Whether that is true or not I do not know, but that was the testimony.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand that the reason why the owners of foreign-built ships have an advantage over American shipowners is that they are subsidized by the foreign governments, and that the foreign governments accordingly pay a part of the freight in advancing a part of the profit through a subsidy, and that the American merchant received incidentally, by reason of lower freight rates, an advantage, and, without taking into consideration the additional handicap in increased cost of building in this country, the American-made ship could not compete with that made in foreign countries because of the subsidies paid.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the gentleman contend that if the foreign ships can carry our trade cheaper than the American vessels that thereby they ought to be allowed to carry it?

Mr. STAFFORD. If American capital——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Then I must decline to yield further. The gentleman from Wisconsin can answer in his own time. I do not want to prevent the gentleman from replying, but I want a little time myself. In regard to a statement made that there are no American ships to carry this trade, I will inform the gentleman that there are enough vessels running out of Puget Sound now to carry four times the trade between this country and the Philippine Islands. There are two vessels that run between Puget Sound and the Orient to-day that can carry more than the trade between this country and the Philippine Islands. The reason that the vessels of the Great Northern Railway no longer go there is because there is no trade for them. In addition to these vessels there are five vessels of the Boston Steamship Company, two of 10,000 tons each and three of about 5,000 tons each that run to Manila. They can not get full cargoes. The statement that there are no American ships to carry this trade is an error. There may be other reasons, and perhaps there are, why this law should be extended, but lack of ships is not one. What I am objecting to is the present consideration of this bill. It has been introduced, been reported, and called up here for passage without the people who are interested in it having any opportunity to be heard.

I know that I should like to have had an opportunity to appear before the committee. I would like to have presented to them some of the facts. I think under the circumstances that we who are opposing this bill can not be charged with being dilatory in this matter. This bill was before our committee before. We had reason to believe it would come there again. In addition to that fact, there is a bill now pending before our committee, as every man who has given the question any attention knows, upon this very subject. I do not think that this is a proper way to legislate, to introduce a bill that before has gone to another committee, call it up in a few days and report it without a hearing, come in here immediately and demand that it be passed. This bill affects interests very directly in my country. It affects American shipping interests everywhere. We ought to have some opportunity to be heard. I think the shipping interests of this country should have had some opportunity to appear and present their side of the case.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD].

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, how much time is there left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] has two minutes remaining, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has twelve minutes remaining.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] may have two minutes in which to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may have two minutes in which to make a statement. Is there objection?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Maine asks that not, perhaps, as a matter of courtesy. I understand that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is not anxious for time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I would like to have an opportunity to reply.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I think I will object. There are other bills waiting, and I do not think the time ought to be extended.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, it would be very unfortunate to occupy two minutes on a bill that must be passed within six days after it is introduced. I congratulate the Committee on Insular Affairs on the great speed that they have manifested in connection with this question. I do not intimate that the speed has been indulged in to prevent people from having an opportunity to be heard, but I do congratulate the committee on its speed, because I never heard of the bill until I saw this morning in the paper that the bill had been reported from the Committee on Insular Affairs, and I was just arranging for my own convenience and in order to take care of the interests of some people that I represent to attend a meeting of the Committee on Insular Affairs for the purpose of being heard on this question.

Now, I do not say the bill is not properly here, and I do not intimate that anybody is getting it here at this time in order to prevent people from being heard. I have no doubt they feel that there is an exigency here, possibly, and they ought to make dispatch, and certainly they are making dispatch. I am sorry that they had to make such dispatch that they could not give the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] even two minutes. The wish of my friend from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] was the father to the thought. The gentleman from Wisconsin did want to say something. The gentleman from Indiana thought he did not want to say something. Therefore he objected.

Now, in the balance of my time I desire to read a letter which very succinctly states the conditions existing in the Philippine Archipelago in connection with this question, as to whether or not the coastwise laws of the United States should be extended to that part of the United States as well as to other portions of the United States, and give to the coastwise merchant marine the same privileges in connection with the Philippine Archipelago that they have elsewhere. So far as I am concerned, on every single item since the Philippine Archipelago became the property of but not a part of the United States, I have voted consistently to apply to them the same legislation, the same rules of law in every respect, either in the imposition of a tariff or any legislation that protects them and protects us, that we have everywhere.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for three minutes more in order to extend my remarks now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I hope the speed involved will not require any objection to this request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The haste is not such as makes it necessary to object.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, I do not object.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I say that I have voted consistently for every proposition of that sort. I believe they ought to have the same constitutional rights, the same legal rights, and I believe in treating them from the beginning to the end as a part of the United States.

Mr. SHERLEY rose.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Oh, just a moment. I have not the time. The gentleman from Kentucky will excuse me, because I want to read this letter, and my time is very short.

Mr. SHERLEY. I see that the gentleman wants to make haste himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have to make haste. I must make hay while the sun shines. I desire to read here a letter which states very clearly and succinctly the conditions that have existed in the Philippine Archipelago, and they make it practically impossible for people interested in the coastwise trade with their vessels to engage successfully in that trade, which gives rise to the conditions that now exist. This letter is already in the RECORD, but I want to put it in the RECORD in this connection, so the committee may appreciate and the House may appreciate these practical conditions. It is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 24, 1906.

Hon. C. E. LITTLEFIELD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. LITTLEFIELD: The real difficulty as to the naval coal trade to Manila is that foreign houses absolutely control the hemp export trade, and will either give no cargoes to American ships bound home or force them to low and profitless figures. A few months ago rates on hemp to the Atlantic coast were about 50 shillings a ton. A large American steamer went out with coal to Manila. Freights instantly dropped to 32 shillings, even for a partial cargo. Immediately after the American steamer sailed freights rose again by foreign ships to approximately 50 shillings—

I suppose they had a trust in the transportation proposition among the foreign ships—

This game is regularly played. I believe but one of our steam or sail ships has had a full return cargo from the Philippines.

These American shipowners chartering tonnage for coal to the Government are compelled to figure at a higher price than foreign shipowners who are reasonably sure of a return cargo from Manila. That these foreign merchants at Manila, under the American flag, should thus make war on our merchant marine is, of course, outrageous, but we must bear it until the coastwise law goes into effect.

That will be until 1909, under this bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, I will ask leave of the House to print the remainder of this letter. That is the foreign combination with the foreign owners with foreign vessels, making a combination that simply makes it impossible for the American ship to get business in Manila, the country that belongs to us, that is not a part of us, and the committee's bill extends the period over which this condition can be continued until 1909. Now, I ask unanimous consent to print the balance of this letter, which more fully shows this condition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The remainder of the letter is as follows:

The Navy Department has not been fair on this question in its reports and testimony to Congress. It must have been aware of the handicap on American ships in Manila trade, but has not said a word about it—leaving the Democrats to infer, as they are glad to do, that our people are a lot of greedy monopolists.

I note that in yesterday's debate it was repeatedly stated that the rate in American ships on Navy coal to Manila was $7.50 a ton. The first American steamship accepted under this act of April 28, 1904, got $7. It appears in the debate that in the year before this law became effective the rate averaged in foreign vessels $6.53. But this American steamship was so delayed in loading that the three next steamers to offer asked $7.50, to cover the delay. Only these three cargoes have paid that rate. All the rest of our Navy coal sent out to Manila has gone, most of it, in sail vessels at a maximum of $6.50 and a minimum of $6. The latest charters, I understand, are at the $6 rate, 53 cents less a ton than the average in foreign bottoms from 1889 to 1904.

Of course the effect of the new law was to make foreigners bid their lowest, so as to prejudice the Navy Department and Congress against American shipowners. Apparently that has succeeded; but if the law were repealed, as the Democrats want, American ships would be driven out and the foreigners would put the rates up again, and the Navy would save little money.

If this matter comes up again in Congress some of these facts ought to be pointed out, and I know nobody so well equipped as you to do it.

Of course, if the subsidy bill is passed and the number of American ships increased, there will be a considerable reduction under this law in coal freights to Manila.

Cordially, yours, WINTHROP L. MARVIN.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield just a minute?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I think my time is out.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I just wanted to ask the gentleman if the letter stated what the gentleman's occupation has been?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; I will be glad to state it. Do I have unanimous consent to state it, or is there too much haste?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is too much haste.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Too much hurry; very well, then, I can state it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not. Time is part of the essence of the contract. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the proposition embodied in this bill is a very simple one, and one not difficult of comprehension. The date of its introduction is not important, and the length of time given to its consideration in committee wholly immaterial if it was carefully and fully considered. The committee which considered and reported it was unanimously of the opinion that there was pressing necessity for its early passage, and therefore consumed no time in useless and unprofitable hearings. Everybody possessing acquaintance with conditions in the Philippine Islands knows that it is very necessary that this bill ought to be passed and passed speedily. As the law now stands, after the 1st of July next the coastwise laws of the United States will apply to all shipping between the United States and the various ports of the Philippine Archipelago. This bill is merely intended to postpone for three years from the 1st of July next the application of the coastwise laws of the United States to our trade and commerce with the Philippine Islands. This bill is in the exact language of that passed two years ago—of the act which then postponed until July, 1906, the application of our coastwise laws to the commerce between the United States and the Philippines. The whole subject was then discussed at length, and the objections urged to that bill are precisely those which are offered. The interests which opposed that bill are opposing this. The question is not a new one, and the committee which considered and which now recommends the passage of this measure has long been familiar with the arguments advanced by its opponents. There are certain interests in America which are unalterably opposed to all legislation of this character. Those interests did not prevail two years ago, and I trust they may not prevail now, for the conditions which so strongly demanded that legislation have in nowise changed. Gentlemen who objected to the measure of two years ago object now to this, and they object for the same reason. My only objection to this bill is that it does not go far enough. Instead of postponing the date of the application of our coastwise laws to vessels engaged in our Philippine trade for three additional years I would postpone their application indefinitely. Instead of making those laws apply to vessels engaged in this trade after 1909, I would enact that they should never apply. That would be more logical, more reasonable, and more just.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I have only a few minutes, I will say to my friend.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. It has been intimated that the cordage trust was behind this legislation. Mr. Speaker, with all due respect for the gentleman who presents that argument, I must say it has no weight with me. I find myself utterly unable to believe that such can be the case; the cordage trust, if there be one, has not attempted to make its influence felt in behalf of this proposed legislation. It is urged by the Secretary of War, it is urged by the Philippine Commission, it is favored by every human being who feels any interest in the welfare of the people of the Philippine Islands. I suspect, Mr. Speaker, if I may venture an opinion as to the interest which any trust is taking in this measure, that there is a very powerful trust strenuously opposing its passage. The talk about some foreign combination monopolizing our carrying trade with the Philippines if this bill is passed does not frighten me in the least. I can not be frightened into pursuing a course which I know will create a killing monopoly at home by the threat that my failure to pursue that course will result in the creation of a foreign monopoly. I don't believe it. Our trade with the Philippines is now quite insignificant, and if it be insisted that it shall be carried only in American bottoms it will soon disappear altogether. The tariff duties which we now impose upon all Philippine products is surely a sufficient burden upon our commerce with our oriental possessions. Unless this measure is passed a cruel monopoly will be created which will destroy forever any little hope there may now be of our enjoying the benefit of any trade with the Philippines. To fail to pass it will close effectually the markets of the United States to the Philippine products and materially increase in the Filipino mind the distrust which is now felt for Americans.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I voted two years ago for an amendment which would have extended this law to 1909. I am more strongly in favor of such a proposition to-day, if possible, than I was at that time. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] says those islands are a part of the United States, that the Constitution is there, and therefore the navigation laws should go there. That means, under the decision of Justice White in the insular cases, that we never can get rid of the islands.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, "the gentleman from Maine" did not state anything of the kind, I beg the gentleman from Wisconsin to note. He said absolutely nothing of the kind.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I so understood the gentleman from Maine. Does the gentleman say that they are not under the Constitution?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. "The gentleman from Maine" said—if the gentleman from Wisconsin would like to know what the gentleman said—they belonged to us, but were not a part of us. I said that I had voted consistently to extend all legislation to that archipelago of every kind and character. That is, in substance, what I said. I did not undertake to discuss their constitutional relations, but I stated it substantially as Mr. Justice White stated it in his opinion, that they belonged to but were not a part of us. I have not any doubt whatever but that the gentleman from Wisconsin intended to quote me correctly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] made an elaborate speech on this floor when the original insular bills were under discussion here, in which he declared that the Constitution had gone to the islands.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. So "the gentleman from Maine" did, and since then, I hope the gentleman realizes—"the gentleman from Maine" does, and "the gentleman from Maine" realizes—there is a tribunal that settles these questions, and that tribunal, by an inconsistent majority of 1, held that they belonged to and were not a part of the United States. And four of the great judges of that court held that they not only belonged to, but were a part of the United States. Now, I said that that, so far as the Philippines were concerned, is the law of the land.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I knew the gentleman's views of the opinion of the majority of the Supreme Court, and I knew that he attacked this alleged incoherent majority opinion in an elaborate speech before a bar association. He took occasion to send me a copy of that speech—a very able effort—and subsequently, in a conversation with me, he said: "A majority of the court can not change my views as to whether the Constitution is there or not. I believe it is there." [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD rose.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Now, then, Mr. Speaker, I must decline to yield further.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. All I have to say is that the "gentleman from Maine" did not even make that last statement.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a word as to the cordage trust. I do not want to say anything unparliamentary, but I feel entirely justified in saying that the talk we have heard here about the cordage trust being back of this legislation is utter nonsense. No member of the Committee on Insular Affairs ever heard of the cordage trust in connection with this measure until to-day. This bill was introduced by Judge CRUMPACKER because, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, and of every other disinterested, competent observer, it is very wrong indeed for us to keep a tariff of 75 per cent of the Dingley rates against those improverished people over there, and then at the same time undertake to put down this law upon them compelling them to give up the tramp steamer, to give up the tramp sailing vessel, to give up everything like open, free competition, and limit transportation of all their products to the ships from the United States. [Applause.] No only that, but every man with whom I talked in the Philippine Archipelago last summer——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I will follow the example of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] and request unanimous consent for three minutes more.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Better make it five minutes. I found three minutes too short.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Four minutes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. While I was in the Philippine Islands last summer I had 100 men, if I had one, yes, 500 business men in Iloilo, Cebu, and Zamboanga, and especially in Manila, say: "Mr. COOPER, do your utmost to get that law repealed; if you can not get it repealed get it extended until the time when the Spanish treaty will expire. It is barbarous to keep 75 per cent duty upon us over here, and then put the coastwise laws upon our trade; treat us like a foreign country, and then deprive us of anything like a fair chance of getting into your market by preventing us from having anything like free competition in transportation."

Mr. Speaker, if there is any man in the House that believes in fair play, let him arise here and say how that sort of treatment can be defended on any ground of fair play. [Loud applause.] So, sir, the Secretary of War, a great American, one of the great men of this generation, wants this time extended. The Philippine Commission, as intelligent and patriotic a body of men as ever represented this country in any capacity, are unanimous in asking for it. The great business interests of Manila are unanimously asking for it.

It has been suggested that the provisions of this bill are incorporated in the ship subsidy bill soon to be reported. But, sir, we want to vote for this relief proposition upon its own merits. Therefore I ask that it pass. [Loud applause.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, it is about time the American Congress began to look after the interests of the Philippine Archipelago in legislation. A few years ago we passed a law abolishing the export tax on the hemp that comes to the United States. That tax was levied for revenue purposes solely and entirely and yielded in the neighborhood of $500,000 a year. The American hemp manufacturers received the sole and entire benefit of the concession, and the archipelago got absolutely nothing in the way of compensatory benefits. Our policy has been to treat the islands as foreign territory in considerations that will operate for their benefit and to treat them as domestic territory in considerations that operate to our benefit. I ask for them only that even-handed justice that belongs to all people who live under the ægis of the Constitution, whether they be citizens or aliens. This question has been considered by Congress and discussed in the press of the country for two years. This particular bill was introduced about a week ago, and some criticism was made by gentlemen who are opposing it as to the manner in which it got before the House. It belongs logically to the Committee on Insular Affairs, because it pertains to the commerce of the archipelago, and that committee is organized to promote the interests of the people of the Philippine Islands. But the question now for decision is, not what committee reported the bill, not whether its consideration has been unduly accelerated, but whether it is right and just. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Division, Mr. Speaker; let us see how many there are of us.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 217, noes 27.

So (two-thirds having voted therefor) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

WOMAN AND CHILD LABOR.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the making of the following order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That for the remainder of the session the bill (H. R. 17562) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to investigate and report upon the industrial, social, moral, educational, and physical conditions of woman and child workers in the United States shall have the privilege belonging to bills reported from committees having leave to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Reserving the right to object, I want to state to the House——

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I move the adoption of the following order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I only want to make a statement of about two or three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New Jersey yield?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I move the adoption of the order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to suspend the rules and agree to the order. Is a second demanded?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I demand a second.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from New Jersey has twenty minutes and the gentleman from Indiana has twenty minutes.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I reserve my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, the only thing I have to say to the House is that the Census Office has now in preparation a report covering substantially the provisions contained in the bill which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] asks to have given a privileged status on the Calendar of the House. There are already statistics in the Census Office upon the subject of child labor and female labor taken in connection with the Twelfth Census in connection with the subject of manufactures, inquiries into which were made in 1905. I have here a statement from the chief of the division of revision and results, showing the scope and character of that report. My judgment is that it is substantially what is provided for in the bill proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey, and in order that the House may know about it I desire to print the statement in the RECORD. I do not deem it wise to pass a bill providing for an expenditure of about $300,000 in the unnecessary duplication of work. I do not ask to have the statement read by the Clerk, but to have it printed in the RECORD for information. I have no objection to the bill proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey having a privileged status on the Calendar of the House. What I rose for originally was to get permission to print in the RECORD the statement that I now offer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to have printed in the RECORD the statement referred to by the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, I reserve the balance of my time. The statement is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR, BUREAU OF THE CENSUS,
Washington, April 5, 1906.

Memorandum in regard to the scope and character of the proposed report on employment of women and children.

The proposed report on the employment of women and children, according to the present plans, will embrace the following classes of data:

1. A classification by race and nativity of the number of children of each sex, 10 to 15 years of age, employed in each of the principal occupations for children. This will show the numbers of native white children, native white born of native parents, native white born of foreign parents, foreign white, negro, and other colored children in each of these occupations. The data will be compiled separately for each State and Territory, and for each city of over 50,000 population.

2. A classification by year of age for the total number of children of each sex, 10 to 15 years of age, employed in all occupations. This will be shown separately for the native white children, native white of native parentage, native white of foreign parentage, foreign white, and negro children. The data will be presented for each State and Territory, and for each city of over 50,000 population.

3. A tabulation showing the number of women or girls engaged in occupations in each of the following age periods: Ten to 15 years, 16 to 20, 21 to 24, 25 to 34, 35 to 44, 45 to 54, 55 to 64, 65 and over. This will be combined with a tabulation giving the same classification by age periods of the total number of women and girls in the entire population, so as to show what proportion or per cent of the women and girls in each age period are engaged in occupations. A tabulation will be presented for all classes combined and also separately for the native white, native white of native parentage, native white of foreign parentage, foreign white, and negro. The data will be compiled separately for each State and Territory, and for each city of over 50,000 population.

4. Data in regard to the families which have children engaged in occupations. From the population schedules it is possible to collate the following data in regard to these families: The number of persons in the family, with sex and age; the number of breadwinners (persons reported as having gainful occupations) and the number of dependents (persons not having gainful occupations); the occupation, sex, and marital condition of the head of the family; the nationality of the family, as determined by the country in which the head of the family was born; the year in which the head of the family, if of foreign birth, immigrated to the United States, and the school attendance and illiteracy of the children in the family. It would be practically impossible to compile and tabulate these data for all families in the United States having children at work, but it is believed that it will be sufficient if such compilations as are significant are made for certain typical groups, so as to show the conditions in some of the principal industries in which child labor is employed in different parts of the country—for instance, the cotton-mill industry in Fall River, also in some of the southern mill towns, the glass industry in Pennsylvania, etc. The extent to which this particular branch of the investigation is carried will depend partly upon the significance of the results which are obtained and partly upon the clerical force that can be employed on this work without interfering with other lines of work in the Bureau of the Census. One of the tabulations which it is proposed to compile from these data will show how many of the children of each year of age in these families are employed in the selected industry, how many in other industries, how many are at school, and how many are at home; that is, neither employed nor at school.

Another tabulation shows the classification of these families according to the number of older breadwinners in the family, thus segregating those families which have no older breadwinners, and therefore are apparently entirely dependent upon child labor. Those families having older breadwinners will be classified according to the number of such breadwinners (families with one older breadwinner, with two, with three, etc.); and then each class of families as determined by the number of breadwinners will be subclassified according to the number of dependents (persons without gainful occupation), thus showing, for instance, how many of the families having only one older breadwinner have no dependents, how many have one dependent, two, three, etc. It is believed that this tabulation will be very valuable as indicating the extent to which the families are dependent upon the earnings of the child. It will be possible also to segregate those families who have no male heads, representing, for the most part, the families of widows. Another tabulation may be prepared classifying the families according to size—that is, number of members in the family, families consisting of two members, three, and four, etc. The total number of persons in each class of families, as determined by size, can then be subdivided into two groups, viz, breadwinners and dependents, and each group may, if deemed advisable, be further subdivided by age. The tabulations here enumerated are in some degree tentative, but the work has been carried far enough to indicate that this class of data is of great importance in connection with this subject and may be presented in such a way as to bring out certain significant and interesting results.

5. A tabulation of women (females 16 years of age and over) engaged in each of the principal occupations for that sex, showing how many of these women are living in families (that is with relatives) and how many are boarding; and of those living in families, how many are heads of families and how many are living with their fathers, how many with mothers, and how many with other relatives, and furthermore, how many are living in families in which there are no other breadwinners, and how many in families in which there is one other, two other, more than two. This tabulation will be shown separately for the native white women, the native white of native parentage, the native white of foreign parentage, and the negro women, and for each of these classes of population the data can be presented by marital conditions so as to show the results separately for the single women, the married, and the widowed and divorced. The data thus compiled will afford some indication of the extent to which women engaged in gainful occupations are living outside home influences and will make possible a comparison as regards this question between the different classes of working women as determined by nativity, marital status, and kind of occupation.

This tabulation, like the preceding one, is too elaborate to be carried out for the entire United States. It is expected, however, that the data can be compiled for the six cities having more than 500,000 population—New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, St. Louis, and Baltimore—and perhaps for some of the smaller towns or cities in which there are industries employing a large number of women.

6. Certain data in regard to the wages of women and children in manufacturing industries can be derived from the material collected by the recent census of manufactures.

This data will show first, the relative importance of men, women, and children among the wage-earners of each manufacturing industry as indicated by the average number of wage-earners of each class employed in that industry during the year. These data can be shown for each State and Territory and for each individual city, so far as may be deemed advisable.

Second, the earnings of women and children as compared with those of men in the same industry. In connection with the census of manufactures a transcript of the pay roll for the busiest week of the year 1904 was obtained from each manufacturer if available. On the basis of this transcript the men, women, and children employed in that week are separately classified according to the scale of their earnings, so as to show the number receiving under $3 per week; number receiving $3 to $4; $4 to $5, etc. Since this statement covers the busiest week in the year it is probable that most of the employees were working on full time, and that their earnings therefore will correspond closely to their wages or rates of pay.

The Bureau of the Census might, if thought best, collect data of a similar character showing the earnings of women and children in some of the more important mercantile pursuits not covered by the census of manufactures—for instance, in the department stores. This possibility is under consideration.

7. It may also be worth while to tabulate the number of children born to married women engaged in occupations for comparison with the number born to other married women. The extent to which this tabulation should be carried would depend upon the results secured from experimental work.

All the above tabulations will present new data—that is, data never before published. A part of the data will be derived from the population schedules of the census of 1900, and a part from the schedules of the census of manufactures taken in 1905. The fact that five years have elapsed since the census of 1900 was taken does not, it is believed, impair the value of the data for the purposes of this report. Economic conditions have not changed so rapidly as that, and human nature has not changed at all. Moreover, it is important to have knowledge of the conditions in 1900 as a starting point from which to measure the future changes, whether in the nature of progress or of retrogression, which may be revealed by the census of 1910 or later censuses.

8. Besides these original sources of information, the statistics published in the main census report on occupations and in other census publications will be utilized so far as they can be made to contribute to the completeness of the discussion by further analysis or new correlations. An illustration of the possible value of work of this character is presented by the recent census bulletin on Negroes, the statistical data for which were derived almost exclusively from reports already published.

9. A study will be made of the census statistics of other countries with a view to introducing international comparison, so far as comparable statistics on this subject can be obtained.

It is hardly possible at this stage of progress to estimate very closely the size of the report. It is my expectation, however, that it will comprise between three and four hundred pages, making it about the size of the bulletin on Negroes.

Respectfully submitted.

J. A. HILL, Chief of Division.

The question was taken; and, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the order was adopted.

REGISTRATION OF TRADE-MARKS.

Mr. CURRIER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15911) to amend the laws of the United States relating to the registration of trade-marks.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the registration of trade-marks used in commerce with foreign nations or among the several States or with Indian tribes, and to protect the same," approved February 20, 1905, be, and is hereby, amended by inserting, after the words "description of the trade-mark itself," the words "if required by the Commissioner of Patents or desired by the applicant;" so that the section, as amended, shall read as follows:

"That the owner of a trade-mark used in commerce with foreign nations, or among the several States, or with Indian tribes, provided such owner shall be domiciled within the territory of the United States or resides in or is located in any foreign country which, by treaty, convention, or law, affords similar privileges to the citizens of the United States, may obtain registration for such trade-mark by complying with the following requirements: First, by filing in the Patent Office an application therefor, in writing, addressed to the Commissioner of Patents, signed by the applicant, specifying his name, domicile, location, and citizenship; the class of merchandise and the particular description of goods comprised in such class to which the trade-mark is appropriated; a description of the trade-mark itself, if required by the Commissioner of Patents or desired by the applicant, and a statement of the mode in which the same is applied and affixed to goods, and the length of time during which the trade-mark has been used. With this statement shall be filed a drawing of the trade-mark, signed by the applicant, or his attorney, and such number of specimens of the trade-mark as actually used as may be required by the Commissioner of Patents. Second, by paying into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $10, and otherwise complying with the requirements of this act and such regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Patents."

SEC. 2. That all applications for registration of trade-marks filed in the Patent Office before the 1st day of April, 1905, on which the fee of $25 required by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1881, had been paid, and on which certificate of registration had not issued prior to said 1st day of April, 1905, shall be deemed to have been pending at that date within the meaning and for the purposes of sections 14 and 24 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the registration of trade-marks in commerce with foreign nations or among the several States or with Indian tribes, and to protect the same," approved February 20, 1905.

SEC. 3. That the Commissioner of Patents shall establish classes of merchandise for the purpose of trade-mark registration, and shall determine the particular description of goods comprised in each class. On a single application for registration of a trade-mark the trade-mark may be registered at the option of the applicant for any or all goods upon which the mark has actually been use comprised in a single class of merchandise, provided the particular description of goods be stated.

SEC. 4. That any owner of a trade-mark who shall have a manufacturing establishment within the territory of the United States shall be accorded, so far as the registration and protection of trade-marks used on the products of such establishment are concerned, the same rights and privileges that are accorded to owners of trade-marks domiciled within the territory of the United States by the act entitled "An act to authorize the registration of trade-marks used in commerce with foreign nations or among the several States or with Indian tribes, and to protect the same," approved February 20, 1905.

SEC. 5. That this act shall take effect upon its passage.

With the following committee amendments:

Amend the first section of the bill by striking out the words "if required by the Commissioner of Patents and desired by the applicant," in lines 9 and 10, on page 1, and in lines 11 and 12, on page 2, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "only when needed to express colors not shown in the drawing."

Amend by striking out section 2 of the bill.

Amend section 3 of the bill by striking out the word "description," in lines 13 and 18, on page 3, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "descriptions."

Amend the numbering of the sections of the bill so that section 3 shall read "section 2;" section 4, "section 3;" section 5, "section 4."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I want to reserve the right to object. That seems to be an exceedingly important bill, and I should like to hear somebody as to its purpose. It is almost too important to be passed by unanimous consent, but still I will merely reserve the right to object.

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Speaker, this bill, which amends the trade-mark legislation of the country, was reported from the committee unanimously. The first section of the bill provides that the applicant for the registration of a trade-mark need not describe the mark itself except when such description is needed to express colors not shown in the drawings.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Why should that necessitate this amendment of the law?

Mr. CURRIER. In all ordinary cases the mark itself, of which a drawing is filed with the application, shows very much better than any description that can be given would show just exactly what is needed. The committee can not conceive of a case where this is not so unless colors are used in the mark.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. But suppose colors are necessary?

Mr. CURRIER. The bill provides that when it is necessary to express colors a description shall be filed.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Does it require the filing of a sample?

Mr. CURRIER. That is always done. A trade-mark is often a single word or a star or something of that kind, and it is difficult to describe. I wish to say that it is dangerous often to attempt to describe it, for the reason that unless the infringer's mark comes precisely within the description filed with the application it will not be held to infringe it.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Suppose it is a close imitation of the genuine trade-mark. What is there provided in this bill for the punishment of the infringement?

Mr. CURRIER. That is provided in the bill to which this is an amendment.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Is there any delineation or delimitation as to what constitutes an infringement?

Mr. CURRIER. Yes; but that is provided in the original law to which this is an amendment.

Mr. BONYNGE. Under the original bill they are required to publish notice that they have filed their application for the trade-mark, and an opportunity is given to anybody to appear in opposition to granting the trade-mark.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Is that retained?

Mr. BONYNGE. That is all retained.

Mr. CURRIER. The committee struck out the second section of the bill, so that I shall not need to refer to that. What was originally the third section, and now becomes the second section of the bill, is a very important section. It provides that the Commissioner of Patents shall establish classes of merchandise for the purpose of registration of a trade-mark, so that on a single application an applicant may register his trade-mark on an entire class of goods, provided always he is actually using the mark on his goods in interstate commerce. Now, that is the law in all the great commercial nations of the earth, and that principle obtained here until about two or three years ago, when the present Commissioner felt constrained to give a different construction to the existing law. The result of that is, I may say, that now an applicant for trade-mark registration is forced to split up his applications. Under the construction now given to the law a man who cans fish and vegetables and meats, must make three applications and pay three fees in order to get trade-mark registration on his goods. One concern in this country that makes carpenters' supplies stated to the committee that they would be forced, under the construction now given to the law, to make 80 applications and pay 80 fees. The purpose of this is to have the Commissioner make classes. Now, in foreign countries the number of classes differs, running from about 40 to about 100.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Does this leave the number of classifications entirely under the control of the Commissioner?

Mr. CURRIER. It leaves the number entirely in his hands.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. What is the method by which you anticipate that the eighty applications are hereafter to be obviated?

Mr. CURRIER. For instance, Collins & Co., manufacturers of edge tools, are now forced to make about eleven applications and pay eleven fees, and under a class comprising edge tools they would make one application and pay one fee and register on all kinds of edge tools. My understanding is that there will be something less than 100 classes constituted by the Commissioner here for these purposes. A great many manufacturers in the country are interested in this, and this amendment meets the most cordial approval of the Commissioner of Patents himself.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Will these classifications be published?

Mr. CURRIER. Certainly. Gentlemen will realize the tremendous burden and inconvenience of the present practice when I say that manufacturers who desire to register abroad are met with the fact that registration of an American mark abroad is based upon registration here; so if a man is forced to split up his application here, he is forced to do it in foreign countries, and it costs in some foreign countries from $40 to $75 for a single registration. Accordingly, a manufacturing concern who is forced to make eighty applications here must pay for eighty applications abroad, and it is a great burden upon it.

Mr. BONYNGE. Manufacturers abroad can get registration by classes.

Mr. CURRIER. Yes.

Mr. BONYNGE. And so the foreign manufacturer has a great advantage over our manufacturers?

Mr. CURRIER. That is it. Now, section 4 provides that a citizen of a foreign country having a manufacturing establishment here can register a mark used on the products of such establishment.

Mr. BONYNGE. And the law we passed last session remains intact?

Mr. CURRIER. Remains intact, except as modified by this bill.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURRIER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FORBIDDING IMPORTATION OF FALSELY STAMPED ARTICLES OF GOLD, ETC.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14604) forbidding the importation and carriage in interstate commerce of falsely or spuriously stamped articles of merchandise made of gold or silver or their alloys, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky objects.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill as amended.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, or association, being a manufacturer of or wholesale or retail dealer in gold or silver jewelry or gold ware, silver goods or silverware, or for any officer, manager, director, or agent of such firm, corporation, or association to import or export or cause to be imported into or exported from the United States for the purpose of selling or disposing of the same, or to deposit or cause to be deposited in the United States mails for transmission thereby, or to deliver or cause to be delivered to any common carrier for transportation from one State, Territory, or possession of the United States, or the District of Columbia, to any other State, Territory, or possession of the United States, or to said District, in interstate commerce, or to transport or cause to be transported from one State, Territory, or possession of the United States, or from the District of Columbia, to any other State, Territory, or possession of the United States, or to said District, in interstate commerce, any article of merchandise manufactured after the date when this act takes effect and made in whole or in part of gold or silver, or any alloy of either of said metals, and having stamped, branded, engraved, or printed thereon, or upon any tag, card, or label attached thereto, or upon any box, package, cover, or wrapper in which said article is incased or inclosed, any mark or word indicating or designed or intended to indicate that the gold or silver or alloy of either of said metals in such article is of a greater degree of fineness than the actual fineness or quality of such gold, silver, or alloy, according to the standards and subject to the qualifications set forth in sections 2 and 3 of this act.

SEC. 2. That in the case of articles of merchandise made in whole or in part of gold or of any of its alloys so imported into or exported from the United States or so deposited in the United States mails for transmission, or so delivered for transportation to any common carrier, or so transported or caused to be transported as specified in the first section of this act, the actual fineness of such gold or alloy shall not be less by more than one-half of 1 carat than the fineness indicated by the mark stamped, branded, engraved, or printed upon any part of such article, or upon any tag, card, or label attached thereto, or upon any box, package, cover, or wrapper in which such article is incased or inclosed; except that in the case of watch cases and flat ware, so made of gold or of any of its alloys, the actual fineness of such gold or alloy shall not be less by more than three one-thousandths parts than the fineness indicated by the mark stamped, branded, engraved, or printed upon such article, or upon any tag, card, or label attached thereto, or upon any box, package, cover, or wrapper in which such article is incased or inclosed: Provided, That in any test for the ascertainment of the fineness of any article mentioned in this section, according to the foregoing standards, the part of the article taken for the test, analysis, or assay shall be such part or portion as does not contain or have attached thereto any solder or alloy of inferior fineness used for brazing or uniting the parts of said article: Provided further, That in the case of any article mentioned in this section, in addition to the foregoing tests and standards, the actual fineness of the entire quantity of gold or of its alloys contained in such article, including all solder and alloy of inferior fineness used for brazing or uniting the parts of such article (all such gold, alloys, and solder being assayed as one piece), shall not be less by more than 1 carat than the fineness indicated by the mark stamped, branded, engraved, or imprinted upon such article, or upon any tag, card, or label attached thereto, or upon any box, package, cover, or wrapper in which such article is incased or inclosed, it being intended that the standards of fineness and the tests or methods for ascertaining the same provided in this section for articles mentioned therein shall be concurrent and not alternative.

SEC. 3. That in the case of articles of merchandise made in whole or in part of silver or any of its alloys so imported or exported from the part of silver or any of its alloys so imported into or exported from the United States, or so deposited in the United States mails for transmission, or so delivered for transportation to any common carrier, or so transported or caused to be transported as specified in the first section of this act, the actual fineness of the silver or alloy thereof of which such article is wholly or partly composed shall not be less by more than four one-thousandth parts than the actual fineness indicated by any mark (other than the word "sterling" or the word "coin") stamped, branded, engraved, or printed upon any part of such article, or upon any tag, card, or label attached thereto, or upon any box, package, cover, or wrapper in which such article is incased or inclosed; and that no such article or tag, card, or label attached thereto, or box, package, cover, or wrapper in which such article is incased or inclosed shall be marked, stamped, branded, engraved, or printed with the word "sterling" or "sterling silver" or any colorable imitation thereof, unless such article or parts thereof purporting to be silver contains nine hundred and twenty-five one-thousandth parts pure silver; and that no such article, tag, card, label, box, package, cover, or wrapper shall be marked, stamped, branded, engraved, or printed with the words "coin" or "coin silver" or colorable imitation thereof unless such article or parts thereof purporting to be silver contains nine hundred one-thousandth parts pure silver: Provided, That in the case of all such articles whose fineness is indicated by the word "sterling" or the word "coin" there shall be allowed a divergence in the fineness of four one-thousandth parts from the foregoing standards: Provided, That in any test for the ascertainment of the fineness of any such article mentioned in this section the part of the article taken for the test, analysis, or assay shall be such part or portion as does not contain or have attached thereto any solder or alloy of inferior fineness used for brazing or uniting the parts of such article: Provided further, That in the case of any article mentioned in this section, in addition to the foregoing tests and standards, the actual fineness of the entire quantity of silver or of its alloys contained in such article, including all solder and alloy of inferior fineness used for brazing or uniting the parts of such article (all such silver, alloys, and solder being assayed as one piece), shall not be less by more than one-thousandth than the fineness indicated by the marked, stamped, branded, engraved, or imprinted upon such article, or upon any tag, card, or label attached thereto, or upon any box, package, cover, or wrapper in which such article is incased or inclosed, it being intended that the standards of fineness and the tests or methods for ascertaining the same provided in this section for articles mentioned therein shall be concurrent and not alternative.

SEC. 4. That in the case of articles of merchandise made in whole or in part of an inferior metal, having deposited or plated thereon or brazed or otherwise affixed thereto a plating, covering, or sheet composed of gold or silver, or of an alloy of either of said metals, and known in the market as rolled gold plate, gold plate, gold filled, silver plate, or gold or silver electroplate, or by any similar designation, so imported into the United States, or so deposited in the United States mails for transmission, or so delivered to any common carrier, or so transported or caused to be transported as specified in the first section of this act, no such article, nor any tag, card, or label attached thereto, nor any box, package, cover, or wrapper in which such article is incased or inclosed, shall be stamped, branded, engraved, or imprinted with any word or mark usually employed to indicate the fineness of gold, unless such word or mark be accompanied by other words plainly indicating that such article or part thereof is made of rolled gold plate, gold plate, or gold electroplate, or is gold filled, as the case may be, and no such article, nor any tag, card, or label attached thereto, nor any box, package, cover, or wrapper in which such article is incased or inclosed, shall be stamped, branded, engraved, or imprinted with the word "sterling" or the word "coin," either alone or in conjunction with other words or marks.

SEC. 5. That each and every person, firm, corporation, or association, being a manufacturer of or a wholesale or retail dealer in gold or silver jewelry, gold ware, silver goods, or silverware, who or which shall knowingly violate any of the provisions of this act, and every officer, manager, director, or managing agent of any such corporation or association having knowledge of such violation and directly participating in such violation or consenting thereto, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States having jurisdiction of crimes within the district in which such violation was committed or through which has been conducted the transportation of the article in respect to which such violation has been committed, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than six months, or both, at the discretion of the court. Whenever the offense is begun in one jurisdiction and completed in another it may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in either jurisdiction in the same manner as if the offense had been actually and wholly committed therein.

SEC. 6. That the expression "article of merchandise" as used in this act shall signify any goods, wares, works of art, commodity, or other thing which may be lawfully kept or offered for sale.

SEC. 7. That all articles of merchandise to which this act applies which shall have been transported into any State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States, and shall remain therein for use, sale, or storage, shall, upon arrival in such State, Territory, District, or possession, be subject to the operation of all the laws of such State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States to the same extent and in the same manner as though said articles of merchandise had been produced in such State, Territory, District, or possession, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

SEC. 8. That this act shall take effect six months after the date of its passage.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. RYAN. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from New York is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Kentucky to twenty minutes.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, this bill if enacted into law will forbid the importation, exportation, or carriage in interstate commerce of falsely or spurious stamped articles of merchandise made of gold or silver or their alloys.

It has been favorably reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce after a hearing.

Several States in the Union have laws prohibiting the false marking of gold and silver articles. The leading nations of Europe have long had laws prohibiting the false marking of gold and silver articles. In some of the countries the marking of the quality of the articles is compulsory; this is so in England, France, Austria, and Switzerland. In Germany the marking is voluntary, but if employed, must be accurate or within five one-thousandths for gold and eight one-thousandths for silver. By the provisions of this bill it is not compulsory to mark gold or silver articles, but if they are marked it must be accurate.

Section 2 provides how articles made in whole or in part of gold or of any of its alloys may be stamped, engraved, or labeled.

Section 3 provides how articles made in whole or in part of silver or of any of its alloys may be branded, engraved, or tagged.

Section 4 provides how articles of merchandise made in whole or in part of an inferior metal and having a plating or covering of gold or silver or of an alloy of either metal and known in the market as rolled gold, plate gold, or silver plate, or gold or silver electroplate, or by any similar designation, may be engraved or imprinted, and prohibits the use of the word "sterling" or the word "coin" on such articles.

Section 5 provides for punishment for violation of this act. The standard provided for the use of the word "sterling" is 0.925, and for the use of the word "coin" is 0.900.

Section 7, with the exception of the word "possessions," is the language of the original-package liquor provision of the Wilson Act.

Mr. Speaker, the bill was introduced by my colleague from New York [Mr. VREELAND], to whom I will yield the balance of my time in order that he may explain in detail what the bill is designed to do.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York has stated to the House the object of this law. It is to prevent the false marking and branding of articles made from gold and silver which are imported into the United States or exported from the United States, or that enter into interstate commerce. I only want to say, Mr. Speaker, that, in my judgment, this is a proper example of the regulation of interstate commerce under the authority of the Constitution.

This bill does not interfere with the police power of the State. It rather promotes and benefits trade, and acts along State lines in helping them to protect the public against imposition.

The United States has lagged behind all the other civilized nations of the world in this line of legislation. Every country of Europe to-day has laws to protect their subjects from imposition by false marking of articles made of gold and silver.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. VREELAND. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that foreign countries have legislation which protects purchasers living in other countries of exported articles as this law purports to do?

Mr. VREELAND. My understanding is that they do. In this bill we have adopted the Swiss standard of fineness for watch cases, and that is within three one-thousandths of full value. I understand that watches made in Switzerland for importation into the United States are required to be within three one-thousandths of what they purport to be.

Mr. STAFFORD. How is it in Germany?

Mr. VREELAND. I can not say in regard to all of the nations, but England requires all articles to be stamped.

Mr. STAFFORD. What argument or what ground of expediency can be advanced that we should concern ourselves with the interests of the purchasers in foreign countries—the consumers of articles manufactured in this country?

Mr. VREELAND. It seems to me that it is very apparent to everybody that it is in the interest of our foreign trade. If it did not take up so much of my time, I would like to read to the gentleman an extract from an English paper, which gives the proceedings of the meeting of the British Horological Institute, a society of all the watchmakers of Great Britain, in which they demand that legislation shall be passed in Great Britain protecting them from fraudulent marking of watches that are sent into that country from the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is a local regulation, for Great Britain, and not for the United States, to legislate upon.

Mr. VREELAND. I hope the gentleman will not take up my time while I am trying to answer his question. I say this great society of Great Britain demands that laws shall be passed protecting them from the manufacturers of the United States who send over there watches that are falsely and fraudulently marked. I ask, What will be the result of it if the manufacturers of this country continue to send abroad articles falsely marked upon the face of them, and if in the end it will not have the effect of destroying our trade in other countries?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire simply to state who are behind this bill. There is in favor of this bill an agreement of all the manufacturers of gold and silver ware in the United States—in New England, in New York, in New Jersey, in Chicago, in St. Louis. After a year of effort we have succeeded in getting an agreement upon what is considered a practicable and workable bill, the agreement coming from all of the manufacturers in the United States. I have received from the dealers in the United States—retail and wholesale—who handle these goods, who have to represent as to what they are to their customers, more than 14,000 letters representing every Congressional district in the United States, asking and urging that legislation of this kind may be passed. It goes without saying that every family in the United States—and every family in the United States at some time buys articles made of gold and silver—desires some regulation, so that when they put their money into silver which they suppose is sterling, and is marked "sterling," or into gold which they suppose is 14 or 16 carats fine, and is so marked, they may have some method of finding out whether they are being defrauded. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman takes his seat I wish he would explain the application and extent of section 6.

Mr. VREELAND. Oh, I only have fifteen minutes altogether.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like the gentleman to explain section 6, which seems to extend the law to every conceivable kind of commerce. It reads:

That the expression "articles of merchandise," as used in this act, shall signify any goods, wares, works of art, commodity, or other thing which may be lawfully kept or offered for sale.

Mr. VREELAND. Yes; but the bill applies only to articles made of gold or silver or an alloy.

Mr. STAFFORD. Whether this phraseology would not extend it to all articles of commerce?

Mr. VREELAND. It would not extend it beyond articles made of gold or silver.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I regret my inability to agree with my amiable friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. VREELAND]. If it were a question of local interest only, I should not resist his efforts, but being a general bill which affects us all and involves my own oath to support the Constitution as well as his and that of other gentlemen in this House, I am compelled to call the attention of the House to the fact that the bill is nothing but an effort to impose upon the Federal Government, contrary to the intention and design of the Constitution, the burden of performing the police duty of this country. There is not presented by it a conceivable case, nor can a conceivable case arrive under it that can not be punished by the courts and laws of the State in which that case might arise. It is true there is a pretense made here of empowering the States, after original packages have been delivered within their borders, to perform police duties. Gentlemen can not by taking counsel add one cubit to the stature of either the State or Federal arm of our dual Government in this respect. They can not confer or take away a police power or duty assigned to either by the Constitution. It is the law, as announced in the case of Plumley v. Massachusetts and affirmed in subsequent cases, that whenever original packages go into a State they are not exempt from the laws of that State, if the question of fraud or deceit or swindling be raised. In the ordinary course of trade Congress may regulate commerce. It has been distinctly recognized many times that the matter of liquors and beers referred to in the Wilson bill are articles of commerce against which no question of fraud or cheating or swindling was raised. That is especially mentioned in the case of Plumley v. Massachusetts, and it expressly held that regardless of the original package, or whence it came, the police powers of the State attach if fraud or dishonesty be alleged. It is not only within their power, Mr. Speaker, but it is the duty of the States to take jurisdiction and punish every act at which this bill is aimed, bad as they are. The States ought to do their duty.

Under our oaths to support the Constitution we ought to see to it that States are not allowed to impose upon the Federal Government and rid themselves of the duty, trouble, and expense of punishing these crimes, perpetrated by cheats and swindlers. If I lived in a State which confessed its incapacity or indisposition to exercise its police power I would renounce my citizenship.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker I want to know why it is that there are three or four different standards of measurement prescribed in section 2. The standard mentioned in the tag is different in gold goods from that which is designated in silver goods.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker I would be very glad indeed to answer the gentleman, but I am unable from the study I have given to the bill to divine any reason for it. The bill is no friend of mine, and I am not in its confidence. I am fighting the bill generally for the reason that it is an unjust and unnecessary imposition on the Federal Government of duties that under the Constitution clearly can be and ought to be discharged by the local governments. I object to the bill for another reason: It confounds postal affairs with the commerce clause of the Constitution and they stand upon principles and plans essentially and radically different. The stuff mentioned in this bill ought not to go through the mails at all. The Post-Office Department ought not to come in competition with transportation companies as carriers of freight and merchandise. It ought to carry letters and newspapers, but I concede that whatever is carried it is proper for the Federal Government to guard the mails and the use of the mails everywhere. In commerce the clause originally designed to prevent discrimination by one State against another State has been construed to authorize all kinds of regulations which affect the usual order of trade and articles legitimately recognized thereunder, but no court, nobody, no State, no Congress has ever gone far enough yet to claim exemption from local laws for original packages if the question of fraud, dishonesty, immorality, or cheating and swindling be raised. All such acts are punishable by the State courts exclusively, regardless of origin or character of packages.

Mr. Speaker I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, my opposition to this bill, like that of the gentleman who has just preceded me, is not against the subject-matter to which it relates so much as it is to the legislative body to which the matter is brought. If it is proper for Congress to legislate in regard to the purity of manufactured articles of gold and silver, when they are the subjects of interstate commerce, it is equally proper for Congress to legislate in regard to the purity of lead, zinc, fluorspar, or anything else used in interstate commerce. It is one of the curious things in connection with American history that the clause that was put into the Constitution of the United States for the purpose of keeping commerce free should now be used for the purpose of hampering commerce. We owe our Constitution to the fact that under the Articles of Confederation there had arisen conflicts between one State and another in regard to interstate commerce, and in order to prevent a State from discriminating against articles from another State it was provided that Congress should have control over commerce between the States, and for another reason, entirely over commerce with foreign nations, for those gentlemen who have taken the trouble to read the history of the debates at that time, realize that the two provisions contained in that commerce clause were given for diametrically opposite purposes. Congress was given control over commerce with foreign nations in order to give the National Government a weapon to fight England and other nations that were discriminating against our commerce on the high seas. It was given control over commerce between the States for the purpose of preventing the States discriminating and not for the purpose of restricting.

Now, there is not a Member here but realizes that the work that legitimately comes to Congress has become so great that we have been forced to not only do work almost entirely by committees, but to do work through heads of Departments. We are not able to consider matters that come here on the floor at all. We are wholly dependent upon the information that some Department presents, and nine times out of ten we follow the recommendations made by the Departments, and yet here are gentlemen asking day after day that we shall not only take care of the many matters now presented, but that we shall go out into the domain of the States and rob them of their police powers. The gentleman said that this does not take away the police powers of the State. That is partially true. If you could fully do it, you would have done that long ago, but you can not. It does do this, however: It does invade what has been declared repeatedly by the Supreme Court to be the sole province and proper domain of State government——

Mr. VREELAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. VREELAND. I was about to ask the gentleman if he noticed under the provisions of section 7 of the bill that articles of merchandise of this kind are expressly put under the State laws when they become intermingled with the property of the State, and I ask the gentleman how that robs the States of their police powers?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is very generous in giving something that the States already had. There is not a line written in your bill that adds one iota to the power of the States over these matters. It is simply a blind. It is held out with the hope that by saying we are not interfering with the States that the bill will be passed. What is the fact? What is happening in every State of the Union to-day? The State legislatures, the State governments, instead of being virile and efficient, are becoming anything but that. State officials do not want to use the power of their State governments because it means State taxation to pay for its exercise, which the people have to pay directly out of their pockets, and so you find officers of State governments charged with these matters coming up to the National Government to ask it to do what it is their duty to do, so that they be relieved of the burden and the States relieved of the cost. I believe it was intended that the individual States of America should be sovereign States, keeping at home among the people 90 per cent of the things that affect life, liberty, and property. I believe the safety of the country lies in keeping such government at home.

If gentlemen are to come here with this bill—a bill that has no more warrant for its existence than any bill relating to any other article of interstate commerce—you might as well regulate, as a gentleman just suggested, how far the bottom of a strawberry box shall be from the top, for strawberries are used in interstate commerce. Can the gentleman give any reason why we should not regulate articles made of bronze, copper, zinc, or lead and used in interstate commerce? They are amalgamated with baser metals and deception is practiced on the public.

Mr. VREELAND. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows why every country in Europe for centuries has regulated gold and silver, and regulated nothing else?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know that to be fact, but I do know this, that every government in Europe that the gentleman refers to and to which the report refers is a government that does not have our dual system of government. That is my answer to the gentleman. If you did not have any sovereign State, if you had but one sovereignty here, there would be hundreds of questions that would properly belong to the National Government that do not now belong to it. I insist that those things which belong to the States shall be kept in the States.

Why, your very report is a refutation of the need of your legislation. You report that the State of New York has recently adopted a law and is enforcing that law. What is happening in New York can happen in every other State of the Union. But it is a modern tendency to come to Washington because it is easier than going to the different States; and it has gone so far now that we have the doctrine proclaimed that whatever is big, because it is big, must be solved by the National Government. You will swamp your Government. You will destroy a representative Government in the true sense of the term if you insist upon going along this road, and I have taken occasion to make these remarks, not because I have any special objection to this particular bill—I have not examined it in detail—but because I know it is not a matter that belongs to the National Government, and because I know in my short experience here that we can not undertake to attend to all the matters that should be subject to the police powers of the State and keep this Government an intelligent and effective one. One gentleman well remarked that this bill is not only using wrongfully power under the interstate-commerce clause, but also under the postal clause. The postal bureau was established for the purpose of conveying information to the people. It is constantly being used now and a constant demand being made on Congress to further use it for the purpose of police regulations, of regulating the morals of the people. What does it matter to the post-office, as a Department of the Government, whether a watch shipped through the mails be gold or half gold, or silver or half silver? Why should your postal affairs be intermingled with this? Is it because you have to find devious ways in and around and about to get away from the idea of the Constitution makers that these police powers belong to and were reserved to the individual States? You have got to take a power given for another purpose and pervert it to this use in order to make your legislation stick. I protest against this, the most flagrant attempt to misuse the power given under the interstate-commerce clause for police purposes. I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, what time is there left on the respective sides?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. VREELAND] has fourteen minutes and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has six minutes remaining.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I only want to reply at this time to one or two points the gentleman has raised. One of them is the very natural and proper inquiry as to whether it is not necessary for the General Government to regulate everything else that goes into interstate and foreign commerce. The gentleman says, "Why should not the Government regulate lumber and iron and zinc?" And he might extend the list much further than that. Why, Mr. Speaker, the reason for this is very evident. I have asked the gentleman why in all of the civilized countries of Europe during all the years when they have manufactured articles from gold and silver those governments have found it necessary to place regulations and safeguards around articles made of gold and silver and not around other things? The gentleman does not deny the necessity for it, but he evades the inquiry by saying that we have a dual form of government and that it should be done by the States.

Now, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that experience has demonstrated that there are two articles that go into interstate commerce that need regulation by the National Government. One of them is articles made out of gold and silver and the other articles which go into the food supply of the country. I insist that there is no necessity for any regulation about lumber, and iron, and zinc, and articles made from wool, cotton, or silk, or tools and implements or machinery, for the reason, Mr. Speaker, that no one need be deceived when they buy those things. Why, a man buys a pair of shoes; if he is defrauded in it he finds it out within six months, and the man who made those shoes and sold those shoes receives his punishment in the loss of trade. But, Mr. Speaker, when a man over in the city of Brooklyn makes a watch like this and stamps it "warranted 14 carat," and when a piece of that watch is cut off and assayed by the United States shows it is only 10 carats, the man who bought it is swindled the difference between 10 and 14 carats. I ask where is the remedy for that man? He may carry that 10-carat watch in his pocket for twenty-five years and never discover that he has been swindled, and that is the reason why articles of gold and silver are singled out for regulation by the General Government.

Now, you tell me there is no trouble to regulate that by the State. We have succeeded, after four years, in forcing a law through the legislature of the State of New York forbidding the manufacturers to make false statements on articles made of gold and silver. The manufacturers of the State of New York very properly said to us, "Why, you are tying our hands, and leaving our competitors' loose. You are forbidding us from cheating upon these articles made of gold and silver, but leaving it open to the men that make the same things in Connecticut, New Jersey, Chicago, or St. Louis, or Kentucky, if they make them out there, or anywhere they are made throughout the United States, to make them and send them out and sell them, and tie our hands so that we can not compete with them, and we will be driven out of business." Now, that is the reason why we can not get State legislation upon this question. That is the reason why they said to us, "Why do you not go to Congress; why do you not have a uniform law or regulation established, where all of us may be bound by it, and where all may be protected by it?"

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the intent and meaning of this bill is to protect the manufacturers as well as the public by excluding within the bounds of interstate and foreign commerce spuriously marked gold ware and silverware out of all the markets of the United States. I can not understand, Mr. Speaker, why anyone should object if I go into a retail jewelry establishment and want to buy a piece of silverware—a ladle, urn, pitcher, or other valuable article—if I try to protect myself against having a spurious, fraudulent article imposed on me. I find it marked "sterling;" that means nine hundred and twenty-five one-thousandths of pure silver. I buy it as pure silver, yet the truth is that instead of getting a "sterling" article, I buy that which runs about four hundred and twenty-five one-thousandths of pure silver. Is not that a misrepresentation? Is it not selling something to a purchaser under false pretenses? It is deceit of the meanest character. This bill seeks to prevent that deception. It seeks to have manufacturers, retailers, and purchasers deal with each other on the basis of honesty and fair dealing.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, does not undertake to prevent a man from selling. We must not forget that it neither seeks to prevent the manufacturer or the retailer from selling their silver or gold wares, nor it does not require the articles to be marked. It puts no restraint upon him in that respect. But it does this: It says, "Mr. Manufacturer and Mr. Retailer, whenever you mark that piece of silver or that piece of gold, by putting on it 'sterling' or '14 carat,' you shall mark it correctly, and it shall contain the standard amount of pure silver and carat gold, as marked, within the leeway under the bill. Does such a requirement wrong anyone? You shall not sell it under any false pretense. If you do not want to mark it, that is all right; let it go unmarked. If you do not want to label it, that is all right." What is the result of that? If this law passes, and it requires the manufacturer to mark his goods correctly when he marks them at all, then should a citizen go into a jewelry establishment to buy, and they show a piece of silver that is offered for sale, and he notices that the piece is not marked at all, what is the inevitable conclusion? Why, the inevitable conclusion is that it is alloyed and adulterated, and not what it is represented to be. We conclude at once that this retailer is suppressing the truth. He is seeking to sell an article that is spurious. How long would such a business house last with that reputation? We hunt another retailer, and find the silver article he offers to sell is marked "sterling," then we know what we are buying, what to calculate on, and that we are dealing with an honest manufacturer or retailer—a man that is complying with the requirements of the law.

This bill, as I say, undertakes to regulate merely articles that are manufactured of gold and silver, in whole or in part, and simply proposes not to prohibit their sale, but to require them to be marked correctly and sold for what they really are. How does this interfere in the least, as is now contended by some gentlemen, with the police rights of the State? Certainly the police powers of the State can not be invoked to shelter fraud and misrepresentation. The bill clearly declares——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr HENRY of Texas. In certain cases does it not forbid the transportation of articles from one State to another?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. What cases do you mean?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Is it not a principle in the bill that certain articles that do not come up to a certain standard of quality shall not be transported from one State to another?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly not, if marked correctly. If a fraud is being attempted, then the transportation of that article from one State into another ought to be forbidden. This is what the bill means. The bill provides that where a State has passed a law and made a standard itself for the manufacture of gold and silver this bill puts the article so made under the provisions of the laws of the State the moment it goes into that State. What possible objection could the most theoretical and ardent advocate of States rights make against that? No interference with the laws of the State is contemplated, but the bill seeks uniformity of rules and standards.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It puts an embargo upon the commerce of the people on certain articles.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. What objection have you to that if the effort is to prevent imposition on the public?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. You have the right to regulate, but not suppress the commerce between the States.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. We have the right under the Constitution to regulate the instrumentalities of commerce between the States; then certainly Congress has the authority to regulate commerce itself. This bill does not suppress commerce. It prevents the transfer from one State to another of any article manufactured of gold or silver bearing a false label or mark.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Just another question and then I am through. Section 6 says that—

> The expression "article of merchandise" as used in this act shall signify any goods, wares, works of art, commodity, or other thing which may be lawfully kept or offered for sale.

Now, does not that mean all articles of commerce, whether silverware or goldware?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It is not so intended.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It says "articles of merchandise."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. We are not seeking to regulate by this bill "articles of merchandise" generally, but the provisions of the bill relate to articles manufactured of gold or silver. The title of the bill discloses its scope: Forbidding the importation or exportation and carriage of falsely or spuriously stamped articles of merchandise of gold or silver.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It may be that it goes further than you intend; and that is what I am afraid of.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It is not the purport or meaning of this bill, as I have shown in the title of the bill and each one of its provisions.

Mr. Speaker, the section that I come from is not engaged in the manufacturing of jewelry. As I understand, for many years in the early history of this country that business was confined to the New England States.

Now, the cities of New York, Chicago, and St. Louis, together with New Jersey, have become the great manufacturers of jewelry, and they send out hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of their articles manufactured of gold and silver throughout the whole country. We all buy them throughout the country, and why should we not expect and require them simply to tell the truth in the marks that they put upon the gold and silver articles? To do less than that is a wrong and injury to honest manufacturers. As I said, if they do not want to mark them they can decline, and trust to the purchaser to come in and buy on his own responsibility and without any guaranty. No one objects to that. All we ask is, as is declared in the pure-food bill, which is kindred legislation to this, not to prevent a man from selling, but to make him tell the truth when he makes representations to the purchaser of what he is selling.

It behooves Congress, and I think it is clearly in the jurisdiction of Congress, within the limits of the commerce clause, to enact legislation that will protect the public against the growing frauds, deceit, and misrepresentations that are daily being practiced with unblushing and reckless audacity. It is worse than idle to declare in such an effort as this that we are invading the "police powers" of the States. There is such a policy as cooperation and mutual aid between the States and the Federal Government for the welfare of the people.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I do not oppose the object sought to be accomplished by this bill, but only the method by which the object is sought to be accomplished. I believe that the objects, so far as the States are concerned, can be just as well secured by the legislatures of the several States. I do not think the gentleman from New York [Mr. VREELAND], who is the author of the bill, will controvert that proposition. If he is ready to do so, I pause to have him do it now.

Mr. VREELAND. I will say to my friend from Massachusetts that, as a practical proposition, I think it is not true. As a theoretical proposition, doubtless the States could enact laws to accomplish this result.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Now, the gentleman asserts as a practical proposition that the States are incapable of exercising the powers which the people of those States reserved to themselves when the Constitution was adopted.

Mr. VREELAND. If the gentleman will pardon me, I should prefer that he did not use the word "incapable." But for reasons, some of which I have stated, they are unwilling to act. Their manufacturers are unwilling to tie their hands and leave the hands of hundreds of others untied in other States.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. If the people of a State believe it desirable for the legislature to prescribe the fineness of an article of gold or silver, will the gentleman tell me why, with such a public opinion, the legislation sought to be secured by this bill can not be secured by the legislature of such a State? Will the gentleman answer that question?

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored to explain.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Won't the gentleman answer that question?

Mr. VREELAND. The difficulties of obtaining legislation by the State legislature I have partly explained. For example, in the State of New York we desired to pass a bill to prevent the false marking of jewelry. Immediately the manufacturers came in and said, "Why, you are tying our hands, you are preventing us from competing with others, but you leave open the hands of men from Massachusetts, from Illinois, from New Jersey, from Rhode Island, and from all over the Union."

Mr. SULLIVAN of Masachusetts. Have you passed such a bill in the State of New York?

Mr. VREELAND. We have succeeded after three years of effort.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Now, the gentleman admits that even in the State of New York, where, he asserts, that there was opposition to such a bill, the people were virtuous enough to compel their legislature to pass such a bill. Why may not similar results be obtained in other States of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. If it is only a question; I have only two minutes.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Congress has recognized this duty and the Supreme Court has recognized its right to prohibit the transmission of lottery tickets through the mails. What is the difference between that right and that duty and preventing the transmission of articles fraudulently tagged through the mails? It Congress has that right and duty, where is the remedy? How can your State meet that condition?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The State can pass a law prohibiting the use of or reception into the State of lottery tickets, which would be perfectly valid. The State can pass a law regulating the fineness of gold and silver articles, as Congress may. What Congress is doing is passing a bill in the exercise of a police power which Congress does not have.

Now the gentleman says that we will not legislate as to other things, because there is no necessity for it. May not some one in the next Congress say the people are suffering because they have shoddy in their woolen suits, and some virtuous gentleman rise up to prohibit the transportation of woolen suits that have any shoddy in them? The next thing we will do will be to regulate the length of nails that have become a subject of interstate commerce, the length and weight of bars of soap, railroad ties, and all other articles that may be the subject of interstate commerce. Where is it going to end? Isn't it about time to leave to the States themselves the powers which they insisted should be reserved them when they consented to come into the Union?

May we not as well amend the Constitution and abolish all State governments as to pass such laws as this under the guise of the exercise of the power to regulate interstate commerce? I think the time has come to allow the States to act upon the subjects of legislation which it was intended should be secured to them, to the end that the State legislatures may retain their virility and command the presence of able men within those States.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I have only four minutes remaining. I want to say to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] that the States have had authority to act at any time within these hundred years. A few of them have acted, but only three or four States out of the whole forty-five that comprise the Union have passed any legislation whatever on this subject. In the meanwhile, Mr. Speaker, hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of articles made from gold and silver are sold to the people of this country, in every State and in every Congressional district every year, which are falsely marked, and by which the purchasers thereof are deceived and defrauded. I insist that we are interfering in no way in this bill with the right of the States. If the State of Kentucky desires to have its citizens buy articles of gold and silver that are falsely and fraudulently branded, they have a perfect right to do so.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VREELAND. I can not yield.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will yield to the gentleman a minute of my time.

Mr. VREELAND. The trouble is that the gentleman has no time remaining.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say to you that, in my judgment, you can go into the stores of this city—you can go into the stores of any city in the United States, and I have looked up the subject carefully—and you will not find 2 per cent of the articles made of gold and silver in those stores that are what they purport to be in the marks put upon them. I have a large collection of articles here that I desire to show to the House, illustrating how articles of gold and silver are falsely marked and branded to deceive the people. Why, the wife of some Member of this House desires to buy some sterling silver spoons; she desires to buy spoons that are 0.925 pure; that will last her through her lifetime, and that will be handed down to her children and her children's children, and she goes to a store to invest her money in sterling silver. The article which I have in my hand is, perhaps, a fair specimen of what she may get. She can get it in almost any large city in the United States, an article marked "Sterling," an article, perhaps, represented to her to be sterling, but which is merely a cheap plate, one which would last her four or five years and then become absolutely worthless. I have here also two other articles of the same kind. There is a gold watch marked "Warranted 14 carats," but the United States assay shows it is only 10 carats. There is a locket which might be bought for some one of your little girls for a Christmas present, an article which, if it were what it purports to be, namely, 14 carats, ought to last her a lifetime, and yet all that is is a filled case of some base metal, washed over with a covering of gold.

Why, I went into one of the great factories of New England while I was looking up this subject last summer—a factory which makes finger rings—where 700 people were employed. They showed me an order from one of the great department stores of the United States, ordering 100 dozen rings to be made, the rings to be marked 18 carats, but to be made only 10 carats fine. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is a common thing, as I am told by those who deal in these things, to order watch cases, to order rings, to order all sorts of things made out of gold and silver, and to have accompanying the order the explicit direction to mark them higher than they actually are in value.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House longer than a half a minute to read to them what the gentleman declined to give to the House in response to an inquiry of mine. The gentleman stated that this proposed law did not interfere with any rights of the States or its citizens; that a merchant in the State of Kentucky was not prohibited from buying or selling false jewelry of silver or gold if he desired to do so. If the gentleman will look in his own bill he will find on the first page, in line 8, that there is an inhibition on importing or exporting any article that does not meet the requirements of this act. Now, no dealer in the State of Kentucky could import from the State of New York nor export to the State of New York such articles if he saw fit. I am not now speaking as to whether he ought to want to do so or not, but I am calling the attention of the House to this as a sample of the accuracy of the statements of the advocates of this sort of legislation.

Mr. RYAN. I call for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. SHERLEY) there were—ayes 139, noes 35.

Accordingly (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

NATIONAL QUARANTINE LAW.

Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 4250) to further enlarge the powers and authority of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service and to impose further duties thereon, and move to suspend the rules, discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill, agree to the amendment reported by the committee in the nature of a substitute, and pass the bill as amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana moves to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the following Senate bill, agree to the amendment in the nature of a substitute, and pass the bill. The Clerk, without objection, will read the substitute in lieu of the Senate bill. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the substitute be dispensed with, as it has already been read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that the reading of the substitute be dispensed with, it being, as the Chair understands, a copy of the House quarantine bill, which passed the House a few days ago. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I think we better have the bill read.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, in explanation, I would say to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] that this is a Senate bill. The whole of the bill after the enacting clause was stricken out, and the amendment reported by the committee adopted. Now, that amendment is the text of the bill that a few days ago passed this House.

The SPEAKER. So the Chair understands. The gentleman from Georgia, however, demands the reading of the amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I thought perhaps the gentleman from Georgia did not understand.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did understand, but, Mr. Speaker, there are so many of these bills being brought up and passed that I think the time of the country can well be expended in reading some of them.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have the control, direction, and management of all quarantine stations, grounds, and anchorages established by authority of the United States, and as soon as practicable after the approval of this act shall select and designate such suitable places for them and establish the same at such points on or near the seacoast of the United States or the border of the United States and a foreign country, as in his judgment are best suited for the same and necessary to prevent the introduction of yellow fever into the United States, and, in his discretion, he may also establish at the group of islands known as the "Dry Tortugas," at the western end of the Florida reef, and at such other point or points on or near the seacoast of the United States (not to exceed four in the aggregate) as he deems necessary, quarantine grounds, stations, and anchorages, whereat or whereto infected vessels having on board any person with yellow fever and bound for any port in the United States may be detained or sent for the purpose of being disinfected, having their cargoes disinfected and discharged, if necessary, and their sick treated in hospitals until all danger of infection or contagion from such vessels, their cargoes, passengers, or crews has been removed.

SEC. 2. That in cases in which the title to the land and water so selected and designated is in the United States it shall be the duty of the department, bureau, or official of the United States having custody or possession of such land and water, or any part thereof, not used by the Government for other purposes designated by law, or possession of said Dry Tortugas Islands, on demand of the Secretary of the Treasury, to deliver the same into his custody and possession for the use of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, evidencing such delivery by a suitable instrument in writing to be delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury. That in cases in which the title to such land and water, or any part thereof, is in any other owner than the United States it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to secure the title and possession of the same to the United States for the use of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service of the United States, by purchase at a reasonable price, if possible; but if, in his judgment, the price demanded for such property be excessive, he is hereby authorized to apply to the Attorney-General of the United States to cause to be instituted, in the proper tribunal, condemnation proceedings in the name of the United States for the purpose of acquiring for the United States the title and possession of such land and water, and said Attorney-General shall, as soon as possible after such application by the Secretary of the Treasury, cause such proceedings to be instituted and conducted to a conclusion, and the custody and possession of such land and water, when duly acquired in accordance with the award made in such condemnation proceedings, shall be delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury for the use of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service.

SEC. 3. That on acquiring possession of any land and water in accordance with the provisions of this act for the purpose of establishing thereat a quarantine station and anchorage, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be published in such newspapers as he may think proper, once a week for four successive weeks, a notice of the selection and designation of such places for quarantine stations and anchorages, with a description of the boundaries of such quarantine stations and anchorages, and such rules and regulations as he shall adopt and promulgate, requiring vessels with yellow fever among their passengers or crews to go to specified quarantine stations and anchorages, to be dealt with there before visiting any port of the United States. He shall establish at such quarantine stations and anchorages all necessary instrumentalities for disinfecting vessels and their cargoes, and where the same shall be required shall erect the necessary hospital buildings and install the necessary furniture and fittings for receiving and treating the sick among the passengers and crews of vessels going to such quarantine stations and anchorages, and provide for the separation of those among their passengers and crews who are suffering from yellow fever from those who are in good health, and shall further provide for doing all things necessary to eradicate such disease from such vessels, their cargoes, passengers, and crews.

SEC. 4. That any vessel, or any officer of any vessel, or other person other than State health or quarantine officers, entering within the limits of any quarantine grounds and anchorages, or any quarantine station and anchorage, or departing therefrom, in disregard of the quarantine rules and regulations or without the permission of the officer in charge of such quarantine ground and anchorage, or of such quarantine station and anchorage, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $300 or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court. That any master or owner of any vessel violating any provision of this act, or any provision of an act entitled "An act granting additional powers and imposing additional duties on the Marine-Hospital Service," approved February 15, 1893, or violating any rule or regulation made in accordance with this act or said act of February 15, 1893, relating to the inspection of vessels, or to the prevention of the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States, or any master, owner, or agent of any vessel making a false statement relative to the sanitary condition of such vessel or its contents, or as to the health of any passenger or person thereon shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 5. That in any place where a quarantine station and plant is already established by State or local authorities it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, before selecting and designating a quarantine station and grounds and anchorage for vessels, to examine such established stations and plants, with a view of obtaining a transfer of the site and plants to the United States; and whenever the proper authorities shall be ready to transfer the same or surrender the use thereof to the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to obtain title thereto or possession and use thereof, and to pay a reasonable compensation therefor, if, in his opinion, such purchase or use will be necessary to the United States for quarantine purposes.

SEC. 6. That whenever any established station, or any land or water, or any part thereof, shall be acquired by the United States under the provisions of this act, jurisdiction over the same shall be ceded to the United States by any State in which the same is situated before any compensation therefor shall be paid or any permanent structures or improvements be made or maintained thereon.

SEC. 7. That every common carrier engaged in interstate commerce shall, under such regulations, restrictions, and safeguards as may be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, receive, carry, and transport through any State or Territory necessary to complete the journey or carriage into a State wherein delivery or debarkation may be lawful all passengers, freight, or baggage which may have been discharged and properly certified in accordance with the regulations of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service; and every person interfering with or obstructing such carrier or any passenger or any instrumentality of commerce in any such carriage or journey shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof be punished by a fine not exceeding $300 or be imprisoned for a period not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That this section shall not be construed as giving authority to any person to debark or unload freight in any locality contrary to the lawful regulations thereof.

SEC. 8. That the sum of $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act, as well as for the purpose generally of preventing the importation of yellow fever into the United States, and for the further purposes, in cooperation with State or municipal health authorities, of eradicating it should it be imported, of preventing its spread from one State into another State, and of destroying its cause.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CURTIS). Is a second demanded?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; I demand a second.

Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized for twenty minutes and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] for twenty minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now take a recess until 11.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on taking a recess until 11.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARTLETT) there were—ayes 125, noes 9.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. The doors will be closed, the Sergeant-at-Arms is directed to bring in absentees, and the roll will be called. The question is, Shall the House take a recess until to-morrow at 11.30 a. m.? The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 165, nays 19, answered "present" 7, not voting 190, as follows:

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would ask if there is a quorum present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is not at present.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adjourn until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House adjourn. Is there a second to that motion?

Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, a point of information, sir. If we adjourn now until 12 o'clock to-morrow, what will be the position of the bill before the House for consideration?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be unfinished business for the next suspension day.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. This is the first motion made to adjourn; does that require a second?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does now. All those in favor of seconding the motion to adjourn will stand and remain standing until counted. [After counting.] Seventeen, not a sufficient number, and the motion is not seconded.

The SPEAKER. The yeas are 165 and the nays are 19; answering "present," 7, a total of 191 voting "yea," "nay," and "present"—in the opinion of the Chair a quorum. The Chair will hand to the Clerk a statement covering the reason the Chair has to assign for holding 191 to be a quorum. The Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

The Constitution of the United States, in the sections relating to the Congress, specifies that "a majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business." This brings to the front the question as to what constitutes the "House," whether it be all the Members provided for by the apportionment, or whether it be a less number determined by existing accidents or exigencies. During the civil war, when many seats in both House and Senate were vacant, this question assumed great significance and was passed upon in both Houses. On July 19, 1861, Mr. Speaker Grow, after listening to debate, decided that a quorum consisted of "a majority of those chosen," but expressly refrained from deciding as to whether the fact of taking or not taking the oath of office should be considered. (See section 250 of Parliamentary Precedents.) In 1879 Mr. Speaker Randall intimated that he held the same view; but in 1886 Mr. Speaker Carlisle treated the question as an open one. In 1890 Mr. Speaker Reed, after careful examination of the precedents of the House, held that a quorum was a majority of those "chosen and living," such, in his opinion, being the intent of Mr. Speaker Grow's ruling in 1861, although the language of 1861 was not in this respect definite.

This, therefore, is the status of the question so far as the decisions of the House go. But at the present time another question arises. The apportionment gives this House 386 Members, of whom 194 are a quorum. But two Members have died, and two—Messrs. Patterson of Tennessee and Williamson of Oregon—have not yet been sworn, and Mr. Swanson has resigned. If the rule be that those "chosen and living" constitute a quorum, without regard to the qualification by taking the oath, then the quorum is 192; but if Members not qualified are not to be counted as part of the House, then the total membership is reduced to 381, and the quorum is 191.

While the question has never been passed on in the House, it has been the subject of most careful consideration in the Senate, and the result is embodied in a permanent form in Rule III, sec. 2: "A quorum shall consist of a majority of the Senators duly chosen and sworn."

At first, in 1862, the Senate declined to commit itself to the rule established by the decision of Mr. Speaker Grow in the House in 1861; but in 1864, after thorough debate, by a vote of yeas 26, nays 11, the Senate resolved that "a quorum of the Senate consists of a majority of the members duly chosen." The question of qualification was brought up in this discussion, but the Senate showed reluctance to bring it into the decision.

On January 17, 1877, the Senate, in adopting rules, agreed to the rule in its present form, specifying the quorum as "a majority of Senators duly chosen and sworn." These words were adopted with very little debate, on the statement by the Senator in charge that they were the words of the old rule of 1864. But, in fact, the words "and sworn" were inserted in the revision of 1868, being recommended by a committee composed of Messrs. Henry B. Anthony, of Rhode Island; Samuel C. Pomeroy, of Kansas, and George F. Edmunds, of Vermont. Their report does not explain their reasons for adding these words, and there was no debate on this point when the Senate agreed to the report. The Senate was undoubtedly aware of the change, however, since the words "and sworn" are italicized in the report, indicating that they were an amendment. On October 11, 1893, the Senate discussed the whole rule briefly, and there was an appeal from a decision of the Chair based on the rule. This appeal was laid on the table—yeas 38, nays 5; but this question did not particularly touch the question of qualification.

Such is the status of this question so far as the law of the House and Senate is concerned. The rule of the Senate goes farther than the decisions in the House, and does not seem to have been the subject of extended deliberation so far as the qualification feature is concerned. But in view of the learning of the committee who made the report of 1868, and of the reasons which seem to sustain that report, the Chair feels constrained to hold that after the House is once organized a quorum consists of a majority of those Members chosen, sworn, and living, whose membership has not been terminated by resignation or by the action of the House.

The SPEAKER. A quorum being present, the House stands in recess until to-morrow, at 11.30 o'clock.

Accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until to-morrow, at 11.30 o'clock.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

WRONGFUL INSURANCE METHODS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I herewith transmit the report and recommendations, with accompanying papers, of the insurance convention which met in February last at Chicago. The convention was called because of the extraordinary disclosures of wrongful insurance methods recently made by the Armstrong legislative committee of the State of New York; the suggestion that it should be called coming to me originally from Governor John A. Johnson, of Minnesota, through Commissioner of Insurance Thomas D. O'Brien, of that State. The convention consisted of about one hundred governors, attorneys-general, and commissioners of insurance of the States and Territories of the Union. The convention was seeking to accomplish uniformity of insurance legislation throughout the States and Territories, and as a prime step toward this purpose decided to endeavor to secure the enactment by the Congress of the United States of a proper insurance code for the District of Columbia, which might serve as a model for the several States. Before adjourning the convention appointed a committee of three attorneys-general and twelve commissioners of insurance of the various States to prepare and have presented to the Congress a bill which should embody the features suggested by the convention. The committee recently met in Chicago, and in thorough and painstaking fashion sought to prepare a bill which should be at once protective of policy holders and fair and just to insurance companies, and which should prevent the graver evils and abuses of the business, and at the same time forestall any wild or drastic legislation which would be more harmful than beneficial. The proposed bill is discussed at length in the accompanying letter by Superintendent Thomas E. Drake, of the department of insurance in the District of Columbia.

I very earnestly hope that the Congress at the earliest opportunity will enact this bill into law, with such changes as its wisdom may dictate. I have no expert familiarity with the business, but I have entire faith in the right judgment and single-minded purpose of the insurance convention which met at Chicago, and of the committee of that convention which formulated the measure herein advocated. We are not to be pardoned if we fail to take every step in our power to prevent the possibility of the repetition of such scandals as those that have occurred in connection with the insurance business as disclosed by the Armstrong committee.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 17, 1906.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF NATIONAL BANKS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution by Mr. TILLMAN, directing the Committee on Finance to inquire whether or not the national banks have made contributions in aid of political committees, etc.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that the resolution be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read at the request of the Senator from South Carolina.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. TILLMAN, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to inquire whether or not the national banks have made contributions in aid of political committees, and if so, to what extent, and why the facts have not been discovered by the Comptroller of the Currency; and whether or not such contributions have been embezzlements, abstractions, or willful misapplications of the funds of the banks which call for restitutions and criminal prosecutions. Said committee is also directed to inquire whether or not the national banks of Chicago have recently engaged in transactions beyond their lawful powers in connection with the recent failure of a bank in that city, and whether such failure involved illegalities and crimes; and also to inquire whether the national banks in Ohio have been in the habit of paying large sums of money in a secret and illicit manner to the county treasurers of Ohio as a compensation to said treasurers for making deposits of public money with such banks; and to report the facts to the Senate, and the opinion of the committee whether any legal proceedings should be instituted on account of the transactions disclosed, and whether the public interest requires any amendments of the existing national banking laws.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I have already addressed the Senate at considerable length on this general topic twice, and at this session, and I feel that I might almost be regarded as cranky on it, because I am going to talk at some length this morning, the third time; but I think it is a very necessary reform that I am seeking to bring about, and I wish to get some action, so that the responsibility, if nothing be done, shall rest, or be shown to rest, on other shoulders than mine.

It so happens that facts have been placed in my possession bearing on the contributions by national banks which probably no other Senator has had, not any Senator that I know of, any way. Therefore, my responsibility is very clear to my mind, and I want to perform my duty under it.

I had not felt that the time was opportune for me to press this matter any sooner than I have already done, because of the immense labor that has been imposed on me by the rate bill. Therefore, I waited for a more favorable opportunity, but on Sunday last a story was published in the New York Herald by Mr. James W. Breen, with whom I had had considerable correspondence and who had furnished me facts, and it is because of this partial publicity that I have introduced the resolution.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the facts that Mr. Breen has himself given. I want to call attention in this body to these facts, because a great many people do not read the Herald. I therefore send to the desk the Herald of Sunday, and ask the Secretary to read the article "How the Banks Filled Hanna's War Chest."

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator from South Carolina who is the author of the article?

Mr. TILLMAN. James W. Breen. I will tell you all about him before I get through. He is not an unknown man, and not an unreliable man, as I will prove to the entire satisfaction of the Senator from Massachusetts and every other Senator. He is not an anonymous correspondent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks that the article sent by him to the Secretary's desk be read.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think it would save a great deal of time to have the article printed without reading. I do not like to consent to its reading.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, just let the Secretary send it here and I will read it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not want the Senator to do that.

Mr. TILLMAN. My voice is in good shape; it will not hurt me at all.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not object to its being read if the Senator insists on it. I did not know but that he would as soon have it printed without reading.

Mr. TILLMAN. How would the Senator know, unless he has read the article, or how would other Senators know, about what I am going to speak?

Mr. ALDRICH. I have myself read the article. I do not know that anyone else here has.

Mr. TILLMAN. You have?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Perhaps that accounts for your indifference to having it read again. But how many other Senators have read it?

Mr. ALDRICH. I am perfectly willing to have the article read.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, if the Senator will allow the Secretary to read it I will send it again to the desk. Otherwise I will read it myself.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not object to its being read at the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

HOW THE BANKS FILLED HANNA'S WAR CHEST—COMPLETE STORY OF VOTING AWAY OF FUNDS IN 1896 BY DIRECTORS FOR POLITICAL PURPOSES—ONE-FOURTH OF 1 PER CENT AMOUNT OF TAX LEVIED ON COMBINED CAPITAL AND SURPLUS OF CONCERNS—TWO "CALLS" MADE—CAME OUT IN PITTSBURG—NOT MADE PUBLIC, THOUGH DEMOCRATS KNEW OF IT, AND SENATOR TILLMAN HAS DELAYED CHARGES.

[By James W. Breen.]

None of the evidence elicited in the recent insurance investigation in New York State excited more public indignation than that showing that large sums had been taken from the treasuries of the great life companies by the trustees and turned over to the Republican campaign managers.

As compared with the sums wasted in useless extravagance or those devoted to promoting or preventing legislation these contributions were small in amount, yet there has been a concerted and consistent demand that the men responsible (great financiers and leading citizens) should not only be compelled to repay these contributions, but should be punished criminally.

The depth and extent of this popular indignation has been somewhat puzzling to persons familiar with political management. It had been assumed that most men of average information were convinced that such contributions by corporations were regular incidents of each returning campaign.

In accounting for the outburst of popular disapprobation the theory has been advanced that while most men were satisfied that such contributions were made, there had never been concrete and undisputed evidence on the point made public.

Banks naturally stand in a different position from insurance companies, so far as political contributions are concerned. An insurance company has a vast number of policy holders of all shades of political belief. To take money in which a rabid Democrat has a beneficial interest and devote it to the election of a Republican is unfair on its face. Banks, on the other hand, are owned by few stockholders, and the controlling interest is usually held by the men on the board of directors.

It is doubtful if any legal proceedings, civil or criminal, could be taken against the bank directors who voted away the money of their institutions in 1896. The statute of limitations would probably have wiped out all legal liability.

There is one point, however, which should be emphasized, so far, at least, as national banks are concerned. During the periodic investigations by bank examiners under the control of the Comptroller of the Currency the facts concerning these contributions must have become known to the examiners and must by them have been suppressed. It is doubtful if any bank examiner was simple enough to imagine that payments of this kind were lawful.

If the bank examiners did their duty the various Comptrollers of the Currency must have been aware of the improper diversion of bank funds in this way. An investigation by a Congressional committee along these lines should prove fruitful.

Singularly enough, Senator PHILANDER C. KNOX is one of the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections charged with the preparation of a bill to prevent improper campaign contributions. Senator KNOX was in 1896 a director of one of the Pittsburg banks called on to contribute to the Republican fund and which, according to popular report, did contribute liberally.

PRACTICALLY A TAX.

Singularly enough, I have had in my possession since 1896 undoubted evidence not only as to the fact of such contributions being made by national banks, but also data showing the manner in which what is practically a tax or assessment is levied.

Here is a copy of a circular which I made from the original during the Bryan campaign:

T. MELLON & SONS, BANKERS,
Pittsburg, Pa., September 2, 1896.

To the board of directors of the City Deposit Bank:

DEAR SIRS: The undersigned have been appointed a committee to solicit from the banks funds in aid of the campaign for the Republican national committee. The banks in New York and some other places have been contributing on the basis of one-quarter of 1 per cent of their combined capital and surplus, and the national committee requests us to ask the Pittsburg banks to do the same.

We only started yesterday afternoon and so far have found all the banks we have approached willing to contribute on this basis. So far we have received the following subscriptions:

Farmers' Deposit National Bank	$5,000
People's National Bank	5,000
National Bank of Commerce	2,750
T. Mellon & Sons	2,750
Bank of Pittsburg	2,500
National Bank of Western Pennsylvania	1,200
Union Trust Co	750

We are informed that the Second National Bank will give $5,000 and that in the other banks we have visited the matter is to be brought before the boards and formally recommended, so that we anticipate favorable action by all. The campaign managers are looking over a much larger area of country than is usual in a national campaign, and it is taking a great deal of money. The question is a vital one to all financial institutions and therefore is declared a proper and legitimate matter for contributions on the part of the banks.

The subscriptions here are payable to James S. McKean, chairman of the auxiliary finance committee, and by that committee will be turned over to the national treasurer, Cornelius N. Bliss, who will receipt to the contributors. On the basis of what the other banks are doing, the City Deposit Bank is asked to subscribe one-quarter of 1 per cent of its capital and surplus, which would be somewhere in the neighborhood of $450. Trusting this matter will have your favorable consideration, we remain,

Respectfully,

T. H. GIVEN,
F. P. DAY,
A. W. MELLON,
Committee.

HOW THE COPY CAME OUT.

I obtained this copy in this manner: While residing in Pittsburg, Pa., on September 3, 1896, I called on Joseph Howley in his law office, in the Carnegie Building, Pittsburg. While I was there an attaché of the City Deposit Bank, of the East End, Pittsburg, which is one of the branches of the Mellon Bank, came in and exhibited a document to Mr. Howley, who was the chairman of the Democratic city committee. Mr. Howley readily saw the significance of the paper, which he handed to me for perusal. The circular was typewritten on paper with a German text letter head of "T. Mellon & Sons, bankers."

After reading this letter I asked permission to make a copy of it. The bank representative who had brought it in told Mr. Howley that the document would have to be returned to the correspondence file of his bank within half an hour or there might be trouble. On my assurance that I could copy the paper in less than half an hour he consented to let me have it. I then took the original to my office, where I speedily made a careful copy. I next went to the office of the Pittsburg Post. The president of the Post company, Albert J. Barr, was not in his office at the time, but I showed the original document to Frank X. Barr, who was then an attaché of the Post business office and more recently county clerk of Allegheny County.

I asked Mr. Frank Barr if he would have some additional typewritten copies made, and inquired how long it would take to procure a facsimile plate for reproduction in a newspaper. This I found would take some hours, longer than I could retain the original in my possession. Mr. Barr had several typewritten copies made, and I returned the original to Mr. Howley, as promised.

Later I went to the office of the Post and gave a copy of the document to Mr. Albert J. Barr. He read it over carefully, seemed much impressed, and remarked that if it were published "it would rock the boat."

To this I replied, "Why shouldn't it be rocked?" He said he would have to consider the matter and advise with others.

Political excitement was running very high at the time. Most men of substance believed that the triumph of the silver issue would result in financial panic, the utter demoralization of business, and set the country back for years. All Pittsburg's business interests were alarmed by Mr. Bryan's radical free-trade views, and could see nothing but ruin to Pittsburg and its industries in case of his election.

The Post, as a regular Democratic newspaper, had been supporting Bryan, but probably more from a sense of duty to the party than from fondness for Mr. Bryan's platform. It had been threatened with a boycott by advertisers, and some patrons had already withdrawn their business. The managers of the Post were acutely sensible that they were "in the enemy's country;" that the men connected with the banks would certainly resent publication of the circular, and that these men were extremely powerful in the community.

At Mr. Barr's request I gave him a day to think the matter over. In the meantime I met William McConway, president of the McConway-Tooley Manufacturing Company, of Pittsburg, who had heard the matter discussed by manufacturers at the Duquesne Club. He asked me if I really intended to publish this document. I replied, "Why not? It is news; very important news."

BUSINESS REASONS.

"Yes," he said, "but it may make trouble in business circles."

Meantime Colonel Guffey, who was the Democratic national committeeman from Pennsylvania, had been informed of the affair, and, although not slow to realize its bearing upon the McKinley campaign, he advanced various "business" reasons why it would be inadvisable for a Democratic newspaper in Pittsburg to print this evidence.

When I called on Mr. Barr on the following day he thanked me for my kind offer and informed me that he had very reluctantly concluded not to take the risk of publishing this letter.

It is no secret in political circles that the national bank assessment of September 2, referred to in the letter quoted above, was only the first installment of the various levies made upon the national banks of the country during that heated campaign. A month or more later Hanna descended on Wall street, the alarm was again sounded, and a tremendous fund was raised for the specific purpose of insuring the success of McKinley electors in the doubtful States, especially New York and Indiana. As the circular letter itself plainly indicates, the September collection was general throughout all the large commercial cities of the North, and the toll exacted by the call issued later in the campaign is reported to have been equally large.

Confining the discussion, however, to the tangible evidence actually in hand, it is seen that eight Pittsburg banks paid an average of $3,118 each to the national Republican campaign committee in response to one call in a single campaign. There are now 128 banks doing business through the Pittsburg Clearing House. In 1896 there were 70. Maintaining this average of $3,118 for each of the 70 banks doing business in Pittsburg in 1896, it is seen that from that city alone the committee would have realized the tidy sum of $218,260 as a result of its first call for aid.

A contribution of one-fourth of 1 per cent of their capital and surplus by the banks of the United States would produce an enormous sum. In September, 1896, the national banks had a capital of $658,126,915. The surplus would bring the total up to at least $1,000,000,000. One-fourth of 1 per cent of the amount would be $2,500,000. It is not to be assumed that all the national banks contributed, but it is reasonably certain that most of those in the larger cities did so—representing probably four-fifths of the combined capital and surplus.

The State banks and trust companies undoubtedly helped the work along. I have not at hand statistics as to the capital and surplus of these institutions, but it seems safe to assert that the banks furnished more than $2,000,000 to Mr. Hanna's war chest on the first call.

FAMOUS SECOND CALL.

It will not be forgotten that late in October Mr. Hanna called on the financial powers for a second contribution—"to make the doubtful States secure." If the call brought half as much, or even one-fourth, as the first one the enormous proportions of the McKinley campaign fund may be estimated when it is remembered that practically all the large industrial and railroad corporations were pouring gold into the treasury of the Republican campaign committee.

The estimate, so far as Pittsburg is concerned, would have to be reduced by eliminating the contribution of one bank. Among the directors of the bank in question was a well-known citizen of Pittsburg, who, when he heard of the proposed contribution or assessment, promptly objected. The directors decided to go ahead, notwithstanding his opposition. He engaged a lawyer and had papers prepared to procure an injunction. The directors then capitulated and no contribution was made by that bank.

It will be noted in the circular of the banks given above that it is stated that the committee will turn the funds over to "the national treasurer, the Hon. Cornelius N. Bliss, who will receipt to the contributors."

In other words, each institution paying money into the fund was given an individual receipt from Mr. Bliss, who, consequently, has, or at least had, knowledge of the identity of each separate contributor and the amount turned over by such contributor to the general fund.

Consequently, if any Senate or other committee wishes information as to campaign contributions, the means of obtaining such information are at hand.

When Senator TILLMAN, of South Carolina, offered a resolution in the United States Senate last December calling upon the Comptroller of the Currency to furnish to the Senate all available information in his Department concerning contributions made by national banks to political funds raised by campaign committees, I wrote to the South Carolina Senator, suggesting that banks which had been guilty of making such political contributions were not likely to surrender their political toll books to the Comptroller of the Currency. I intimated that if he desired real evidence, and if he would use such evidence vigorously and impartially, I should be glad to aid him. To this note I received from Senator TILLMAN, under date of December 11, 1905, a reply, of which this is an extract:

"I do want, above all things, the absolute proof of the charges I have indirectly made in my speech and in the resolution itself. If you will furnish me this evidence I will drive the dagger home to the hilt, it does not matter into whose bosom it may go, Democrat or Republican.

"COMPTROLLER 'SUPPLE TOOL.'

"I know the Comptroller of the Currency has been the supple tool of the national banks for these many years, and I took occasion in the Senate once to call attention to the fact that all the men who have filled that position, except three, have graduated from it into high positions in the banking and 'trust' world at big salaries. Furnish me the ammunition you have, and by the holy gods I will use it."

After verifying my standing and responsibility and examining some of my evidence, Senator TILLMAN proceeded to get his Senatorial bearings. He obtained assurances of prominent Republican Senators that the matter should be given a full and free hearing. But meantime the rate bill took the center of the stage. About the middle of last month certain distinguished representatives of great business interests called on President Roosevelt and subsequently it was announced that something like an ultimatum had been presented, in which representatives of certain great corporations had intimated that if there was to be an unseemly ripping up of their private affairs, they would "take off the lid" absolutely and unfold tales concerning campaign contributions that would shock the entire country.

Senatorial enthusiasm on the subject of an investigation appeared to have been chilled, and on March 13 last the Committee on Privileges and Elections decided that it was inexpedient to embark in any investigation of campaign contributions by the national banks. A subcommittee, consisting of Senators BAILEY, FORAKER, and KNOX, was thereupon appointed to draft such a bill as would prevent these campaign abuses hereafter. Senator TILLMAN vigorously, but vainly, strove to persuade the committee to investigate the campaign contributions, beginning with those of 1896. He maintained that in the election of that year high-water mark was reached in the scandal of vote buying and lavish campaign expenditure. That was the one year above all others when the country had to be "saved" against the peril of Bryanism and free silver.

Believing that there was still a strong sentiment among independent Republican Senators favorable to an investigation, I again addressed Senator TILLMAN in a note, the important part of which was as follows:

"Touching the matter of Presidential campaign contributions by corporate or other interests, which is now before the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections, of which you are a member, I would, if not trenching overmuch on your time and courtesy, deferentially ask, Can an adequate remedy be devised or enforced against such contributing offenders without specific prior evidence of the methods of such offenders?

"WHAT COULD BE PROVED.

"With a view to affording your honorable committee such specific information as might serve as a ground work for effective remedial legislative action, punitive or preventive, I would respond to a subpœna and would appear before your committee and furnish under oath specific information proving and tending to prove this set of facts, to wit:

"First. A written document properly attested and authenticated, signed by leading banks and bankers, setting forth specific contributions for the Presidential campaign of 1896.

"Second. Said document shows, further, the names of donors and 'donees,' and the specific purposes of such donations or assessments.

"Third. Date, amounts, to whom paid, and by whom paid.

"In addition to this I will procure evidence showing that certain stockholders or directors in one or more banks named objected to such political contributions, and by threat of legal action (bill in equity) prevented the payment at that time of a portion of said assessments or contributions.

"I am advised by legal authority that such payments by such corporations for such purposes are illegal and against the letter and spirit of the national banking act and the United States Revised Statutes—this apart from the moral and political wrong of such corrupt and corrupting practices.

"I am not partisan enough to believe that such practices are the monopoly of any one party, as a long and varied experience leads me to believe that many 'managing politicians,' irrespective of party, if not awed by a militant public opinion or by stringent legislation, oft resort to what is irreverently termed 'yellow-dog methods.'

"I may add in conclusion that I have information other than what is here outlined touching later elections and political contributions, but will not at present trespass further on your time.

After Senator TILLMAN was formally intrusted with the charge of the rate bill his time seemed fully occupied with that measure, and so far as I could learn there was little chance of an inquiry such as I desired being undertaken by the Senate at this session. I therefore placed my material at the disposition of the Herald, in order that proper publicity might be secured before the existing feeling against corporation campaign contributions had subsided, hoping thereby to assist in the passage of proper remedial legislation. I informed Senator TILLMAN of my action in the premises and received the following in reply, dated April 11, 1906:

"I should feel that a great opportunity had been lost to get the attention of the country if you printed in any publication the facts you gave me before I used them in the Senate. I intend to seize the very first opportunity to make a speech and ventilate the whole thing, so I sincerely trust you will hold off a while longer."

It was then, however, too late to make any change in my arrangements. I am satisfied that Senator TILLMAN is anxious to probe the matter to the bottom, but with the technical position of business in the Senate it is doubtful if much could be done at this session.

PROMINENT MEN WHO KNEW.

Among the men prominently identified with the Pittsburg banks as officers and directors in 1896 were these: First National, F. H. Skelding, then cashier, now president; Alexander Nimlnck, iron manufacturer; Theodore Wrightman, glass manufacturer; Second National, John G. Stevenson, wholesale dry goods; Thomas D. Chaniter, corporation lawyer; James H. Willock, president, recently to sanitarium for mental treatment; Third National, John Farrell, of the Bailey and Farrell Manufacturing Company, sanitary supplies; Fourth National, Jacob Porter, of the then Porter-Dilworth Iron Works; Allegheny National, John Caldwell, jr., of the Westinghouse interests; Thomas Evans, glass manufacturer; Citizens' National, George A. Berry, president of the Monongahela Insurance Company; H. C. Bughman, financier; Columbia National, E. H. Jennings, Standard Oil; Diamond National, John S. Sculley, oil and coal land speculator.

Exchange National—Mark W. Watson, iron and steel manufacturer and principal owner of the Philadelphia Press; A. H. Childs, brother-in-law of H. C. Frick, capitalist; John B. Jackson, president of the Fidelity Trust. Farmers' Deposit National—Former Judge James H. Reed, formerly law partner of Senator KNOX, railroad president, great corporation lawyer, one of Pittsburg's strongest men and always a straight Republican; T. Hart Given, one of the signers to the circular, then president, as he is now; Hay Walker, jr., of Harbison-Walker refractories (the brick trust). First National of Birmingham, at Pittsburg—H. Sellers McKee, glass manufacturer. Fort Pitt National—President, D. Leet Wilson, president Central District and Printing Telegraph Company (the Bell telephone organization in this section); Samuel Ewart, wholesale grocer. German National—E. H. Myers, pork packer; A. Frauenheim, brewer. Iron City National—Alexander M. Byers, now deceased, iron and steel and principal cotton-tie manufacturer in United States. Liberty National—R. B. Ward, bakeries; Edward M. Bigelow, director department of public safety and Republican boss for many years. Marine National—J. E. Umstaetter, at that time connected with Carnegie steel interests; T. J. Wood, coal operator. Corey, coal operator, uncle of W. E. Corey, president United States Steel Corporation; District Attorney Stewart. Union Trust—Henry C. Frick, Senator D. E. and William G. Park, whose steel works were later on taken over by the Crucible Steel concern; A. W. Mellon, also of what is now the Mellon National.

The Union Trust in later years had among its directorate James Hazen Hyde, E. C. Converse, Charles Lockhart, the late Standard Oil man of this city, whose estate is estimated at one hundred and fifty millions; Col. J. M. Schoonmaker, of the Pittsburg and Lake Erie road; Thomas Morrison, of the Carnegie interests; William B. Schiller, head of National Tube Works, and Col. J. B. Finley, wealthy coal operator. The other officers and directors of the Allegheny County banks stand on a par with those here enumerated. A very conservative estimate is that fully 85 per cent of these officials are strong Republicans.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, before I state who Mr. Breen is, I want to make a comment or two on some of the utterances in the article itself and to briefly explain why I feel constrained to make this full exposition to-day.

There are statements in this article to the effect that Senatorial ardor appeared to cool, and as I had never seen any Senatorial ardor that was very hot on this trail, except my own, I was afraid that some might suppose that my own ardor had cooled; but the trouble has been this, you know: I called the attention of the Senate to the resolution, and I spoke on it at some length. It was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections in December. Then, later, as soon as I had obtained some substantial evidence, I notified the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], that I was ready to appear before his committee. After some little trouble—not of his making, but mainly of my own, because I had to leave the city; anyway, it was a couple of weeks—I did appear. To my surprise, when the matter was broached and the importance of it was presented by myself, and without giving any names, I merely stating that I would prove certain facts, I found the committee in a very conformable frame of mind. To my surprise they threw up their hands, so to speak, and said, "Why, of course everybody contributed; the banks and everybody else in the United States; there was great necessity for it in the minds of some people, and of course it is all right." They did not seem at all inclined to probe for evidence as to contributions, or even to go back to 1896, but said, as a substitute for it, they would report the bill which I had introduced on February 19. That bill was referred to a subcommittee. Three weeks ago, I think it was, I broke loose in the Senate one morning [laughter] and called the attention of the Senate to the fact that neither the subcommittee nor the full committee would act; when the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] got angry with me because he seemed to think that I had acted in a discourteous way toward himself and his brethren on that committee in alluding to it, when he had assured me that he was going to attend to the matter immediately. That was three weeks ago, and still that bill hangs fire somehow or other; it will not get on the Calendar, and we can not get the Senate to pass it and push it over to the House, where they have need for some campaign contributions, you know.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I hardly think the Senator from South Carolina is justified in saying that I became angry with him. That, Mr. President, would be impossible.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am very glad the Senator from Ohio has such a kindly feeling toward me.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to say, however, that when the Senator undertook to call the Senate committee to account, I did rise and inform the Senator from South Carolina, repeating what I said to him only the day before, that the subcommittee had been appointed only a very few days prior to the time when he spoke, three weeks ago, and that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] was a member of the subcommittee; and that he had, I believe the very day or the day after the subcommittee had been appointed, been called from the city by reason of a loss in his family, which certainly gave him a good excuse for being away, and therefore it was impossible to get the subcommittee together for conference; that his absence made it impossible for us to confer with him; that as soon as he returned we would be glad to take the matter up; and as soon as he did return I would see to it that it was taken up with him and with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. We have had a number of conferences, and I think we are ready to make a report to the full committee as soon as there is a meeting of the committee at which we can be heard. Since we had these conferences there have been only two meetings of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. At one all the time of the committee was occupied by Mr. Carlisle in making an argument in the Smoot case, and all of the other session of the committee was occupied by the attorney for Mr. SMOOT in answer to the argument of Mr. Carlisle, so that we have had no opportunity to make a report to the full committee.

I can assure the Senator there is no disposition whatever on the part of any member of the subcommittee to shirk the duty or evade it or delay the performance of it. We considered the subject, and I think we are of one mind that there ought to be legislation. We may have some difference, and I think we do as to the extent to which we should go, but there is nothing unusual about that.

Now that I am on my feet, I want to say, on behalf of the whole committee, that when the Senator from South Carolina appeared the committee did not "throw up their hands," or do anything of that sort, to employ the phrase he has just employed; but when the attention of the committee was called to the subject there was no disposition manifested on the part of anybody belonging to the committee to controvert the claim the Senator made, that the banks of this country had made contributions to the national Republican campaign fund in 1896. I stated in the committee at that time—and I suppose I may be allowed, in view of what the Senator has said, to state in the Senate what occurred in the committee room—that while I had no personal knowledge on the subject, I had heard that the banks of the country were making contributions; but to what extent they had made contributions I did not know. I thought the national banks should not make such contributions; certainly not except in extraordinary and exceptional cases, and that seemed to be one at the time; and that I was willing, because I believed that it was improper, to favor legislation that would prohibit their making further contributions; but because there was no difference of opinion as to the fact that they had made contributions, it did not seem necessary to make any investigation to establish that fact. That is about the extent, as I remember it, of the statements that were made by the members of the committee at that time.

Now, so far as the subcommittee is concerned, I want to make one other remark. Every member of that subcommittee is pretty busy with other duties, and some of the duties we have had have seemed more pressing than this. That may and should operate to extenuate the delay, if any extenuation may be needed. The Senator from Texas, immediately after he returned, was very much engrossed for a few days with the preparation of the argument that he made to the Senate—an argument that I am sure the entire Senate felt under obligations to him for making. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] also addressed the Senate; and so it has been with all of us. We have had duties that have been very pressing; and yet, notwithstanding that fact, there has been no delay whatever. The only reason there has been no report made has been one with which the Senator from South Carolina is entirely familiar, that there has been no meeting of the full committee at which a report could be made since the matter was referred to the subcommittee and since the subcommittee considered it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I have no purpose of reflecting on the subcommittee. I merely mentioned as a part of the current report of things that have happened that it was three weeks ago that I had brought this matter up incidentally, and I thought the Senator from Ohio displayed some vexation—I will not say he got angry or mad, because I do not believe those words were justified, but I had to apologize to him, which I very readily did when I found that he really was wounded at my seeming discourtesy, because I had no such intention. I do not want to reflect on the committee now. There are various and brilliant methods of "how not to do it" in this body, with which I am getting more or less acquainted. I find that some men are more expert at that art than others; and having failed to accomplish anything of material use or benefit through the Committee on Privileges and Elections, the Senator will note that this last resolution goes in a different direction and is referred to the Committee on Finance, where there is sterner stuff. While I have no great amount of hope that I will succeed any better, I still intend to continue to peg away as occasion offers, trying to get some legislation looking to the prevention of this abuse.

The Senator from Ohio and the other members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections all agreed that it was an abuse and ought to be corrected. When we recall the fact that it takes some time for bills that the House does not want to pass to get through the House, and when we recall the fact that an election is approaching, when there will be need of campaign funds, I should like to stop this kind of contribution at least before the next election, and not wait until doomsday before getting Congress to take some substantial action looking to the prevention of this crime. That is my excuse for unduly pressing this matter. The subcommittee, I suppose, will report it some time soon.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, as I have already stated to the Senator, both here in the Chamber and at other times and places in conversation, the subcommittee has had no opportunity to make its report; but we will report just as soon as there is a meeting of the committee. I presume there will be a meeting of the committee possibly next Friday, though I do not know, as that matter rests with the chairman. I think the committee stands adjourned, awaiting the filing of briefs of counsel in the SMOOT case.

I want to say one other thing. The Senator speaks here not only to the RECORD, but to the whole country. There is not a member of this subcommittee, perhaps, but has a meeting of a committee every morning. I have.

Mr. TILLMAN. I recognize the immense amount of labor that we have to perform here and the burdens that are upon us, and I do not want to have the appearance of being unseemly in my desire to get action.

Mr. FORAKER. In no spirit of resentment at all, but simply to call the Senator's attention to the fact, I do not think he ought to make statements that indicate that Senators, who are working every day about important matters in various committees, are neglecting anything. I do not know of any Senator who is neglecting anything. Certainly there is no occasion to neglect this proposition, and there is no difference of opinion in the committee as to the propriety of legislating. It is only a question of exactly what the phraseology of the bill should be. The Senator introduced a bill which we have had under consideration, and if he would take the trouble to walk to my desk he could see the form in which it will probably be reported, so far, at least, as I am concerned.

Mr. TILLMAN. I would much rather see the report than to see the form in which it is on the Senator's desk.

Mr. FORAKER. I can not report it until there is a meeting of the committee. There will be a meeting of the committee as soon as the chairman can find time and suitable opportunity to have a meeting. I have a committee meeting every morning: I do not miss a morning from the beginning of the week until the end of it. Every day of the week there is first one committee meeting and then another, and in every committee there is a great deal of work to do. I do not think any Senator who works with me on any committee will for one minute believe in the insinuation that anybody might make that I would shirk or neglect any duty or would unnecessarily delay any matter.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not intimated that the Senator from Ohio is shirking anything. I have not intimated that anybody is shirking anything. I simply say there are ways of how not to do things here when a committee does not want to do them. I have tried very hard to get action, but I can not.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the Senator is just now repeating what, in a kind way, I took exception to. I am afraid to speak very emphatically, after what he has said, for fear he will think I am angry. But when he says, "Well, there is a way in which not to do things, and some men are more skilled than others in that art, and I have at last come to find out how this thing of not doing things is accomplished," that is an insinuation, as it seems to me, that somebody is not doing what he ought to do.

Now, I submit to the Senator that there is no ground whatever—and he should acknowledge it—on which to criticise either the subcommittee or the committee which has this matter in charge. But I do not want to further interrupt the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. Having tried since the beginning of the session to get something done, having the backing of the President in his message calling attention to this very abuse and urging Congress to take action, and having on previous occasions, as best I could, shown the enormity of the crime, as I consider it, I think it is an important matter, and that Senators who may think differently from me ought not to be so busy with other concerns. I have seen bills carried around in this body—bills possibly of no more importance than this—and a vote taken by asking, "Are you willing to have this bill reported?" It is absolutely a question whether it is desired to do it or not. I do not say the Senators on the other side are trying to shirk the responsibility or to flinch from it.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, always.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator is aware that bills are never carried around and the committee polled except where the bills are pending before the committee. This bill was referred to a subcommittee, and until it is reported by the subcommittee to the whole committee there could not be any polling of the committee in regard to it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Having the assurance of the Senator in charge of the subcommittee that this matter will be acted upon as soon as possible——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield further to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course.

Mr. FORAKER. While committees are sometimes polled, very frequently polled, I think it is always in cases of minor importance. On very important bills, as a rule, committees are not polled. So far as my knowledge goes, they are not polled at all on important bills, and they ought not to be polled on any, as the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] suggests to me. Bills are better considered in committee, where everybody has an opportunity to discuss them, and where we can hear and consider the points that ought to be considered in connection with them.

Mr. TILLMAN. I did not have the slightest intention or desire to discuss this phase of it. I was merely alluding to it in passing, trying to get the record straight.

Now, I will return to Mr. Breen, about whom the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] a moment ago was solicitous of obtaining some information.

When Mr. Breen first volunteered to furnish me information in regard to national-bank contributions and sent me the exhibits which he has made public in the New York Herald, or most of them, I set about investigating Mr. Breen, because I did not feel willing to undertake to father a movement looking for an investigation of national banks without some substantial facts back of it. Among other things with which I was furnished in regard to Mr. Breen is a list of references. I will have it printed, merely stating that the first man on the list is Hon. John P. Elkin, justice of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, and the list ends with John B. Larkin, city controller of Pittsburg, Pa. I ask that it may go in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the list will be printed in the RECORD.

The list referred to is as follows:

Mr. TILLMAN. Next I have a letter, dated October 11, 1901, signed by George J. Whitney. I do not know who or what he is, but I judge by the letter head that he is a large broker. In it he gives Mr. Breen a fine character and all that kind of thing. I will ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

PITTSBURG, October 11, 1901.

JAMES W. BREEN, Esq.

MY DEAR BREEN: Replying to your favor of 10th instant, it goes without saying that any concern that can secure your talents and ability in the promotion or conduct of their business will have drawn a prize. You are at perfect liberty to refer your people to me individually or to our firm as to your capabilities and integrity.

Wishing you success in your proposed new field,

I am, sincerely, yours,

GEORGE J. WHITNEY.

Mr. TILLMAN. Next I have a letter addressed to the President.

PITTSBURG, PA., August 1, 1898.

To the PRESIDENT, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I desire to indorse the application of Mr. James W. Breen, of this city, as one of the members of the Phillips Labor Commission.

Mr. Breen has had considerable experience in the treatment of labor topics as a newspaper man and as a close student of industrial and economic questions.

I feel assured that his appointment would be a fitting one, and that he would be a valuable member of the commission.

Respectfully,

ALBERT J. BARR,
Proprietor Post.

Next I have had sent me a letter from Valley Forge, Pa.

VALLEY FORGE, PA., July 22, 1904.

DEAR SIR: This will introduce an old friend and acquaintance, Mr. J. W. Breen, who has telegraphed me he has some important information he desires to lay before you.

Yours, very sincerely, P. C. KNOX.

Hon. GEORGE B. CORTELYOU,
Washington, D. C.

If the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] wishes to verify the signature, I will send the letter to him.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I have a perfect recollection of writing that letter, and I can assist the Senator from South Carolina further by saying that I know Mr. James W. Breen, and have known him for a great many years, and he is a thoroughly reliable man.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then it is unnecessary to do more than to mention the fact that I have here a copy of a lettter addressed to the present governor of Pennsylvania by his predecessor. It is signed by Governor Stone and is addressed to Governor Pennypacker, and is along the same lines.

The letter referred to is as follows:

STONE & STONE, ATTORNEYS AT LAW,
Pittsburg, Pa., October 26, 1905.

Hon. S. W. PENNYPACKER,
Governor Pennsylvania, Harrisburg, Pa.

DEAR SIR: I desire to introduce to you James W. Breen, esq., formerly of Pittsburg, now located in Philadelphia. He is engaged in literary work. I have known Mr. Breen for many years; he is one of the ablest, brightest newspaper men I have ever met. He has done what very few have done in that profession; he has achieved success financially and reputably. I think he is a man in whom confidence may be wisely placed.

He desired me to write him a letter of introduction to you, which I take pleasure in doing.

Very truly, yours,
WILLIAM A. STONE.

Mr. TILLMAN. There is one addressed to Colonel Lowe, by Albert J. Barr.

The letter referred to is as follows:

THE PITTSBURGH POST,
Pittsburg, March 8, 1895.

Colonel LOWE,
The News, Galveston, Tex.

MY DEAR COLONEL LOWE: This letter will be presented by Mr. James W. Breen, of Pittsburg, who goes to Texas, "The Land of Promise," on newspaper business. I have known Mr. Breen for many years as one of the brightest all-around newspaper men of this city. He was for years connected with the Post, afterwards proprietor of a Sunday paper. I bespeak for him your kind attention and will appreciate anything you may do for him.

With best wishes for the continued success of the Galveston end of our firm, and the descendants of Lafitte, I am,

Very truly, yours,
ALBERT J. BARR.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I have one addressed to Mr. Breen by his sincere friend CHARLES W. FAIRBANKS.

The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 21, 1905.

MY DEAR MR. BREEN: Your letter of the 16th recalls very pleasant memories of the long ago when you were editor of the Pittsburg Post. I shall never forget your very kindly assistance and your generous, friendly counsel.

The incident in the Greeley campaign to which you refer comes back to me most vividly.

If the matter concerning which you write can be accomplished, it shall be done with the very greatest of pleasure. I will advise you further in the premises.

With all good wishes, I remain,
Sincerely, your friend,
CHAS. W. FAIRBANKS.

Mr. JAMES W. BREEN,
124 North Twelfth Street, Philadelphia Pa.

Mr. TILLMAN. And later I have a letter addressed to me:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 29, 1906.

MY DEAR SENATOR TILLMAN: I have just discovered your note with reference to Mr. Breen, of Philadelphia. I met Mr. Breen in Pittsburg in 1872–3. He was connected with the Pittsburg Post, and I was the agent of the Associated Press at that point. I found Mr. Breen a very conscientious, agreeable gentleman, and retain a most delightful memory of his courtesy and kindness.

Very sincerely, yours,
CHAS. W. FAIRBANKS.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
United States Senate.

So I do not imagine anybody will any longer question Mr. Breen's character and reliability.

Now, then, to get back to some of the other facts in regard to——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I hope he did not suppose that I intended to cast any reflection upon Mr. Breen. I had not the good fortune to have heard of him, which I suppose argues myself unknown, and I merely wanted to know who he was, as the Senator was putting him forward as the sponsor of very important charges. It was obvious, of course, from hearing the newspaper article read that he is a man of excellent judgment, as we can see from his observations in regard to the Senator from South Carolina; but I wanted to know a little further who he was.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very naturally the Senator wanted to know whether I was quoting an anonymous somebody here——

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no.

Mr. TILLMAN. Some of the "muck rakers," for instance.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, some of the muck rakers' things have been read here.

Mr. TILLMAN. Not by me, that I know of. I have been bit that way sometimes, but not of late years.

To get back to the question of campaign contributions, the Committee on Privileges and Elections seemed unwilling, if I may state it, to go back to 1896. Acknowledging, as the Senator from Ohio has acknowledged, in substance, that it was generally understood that campaign contributions had been made by the national banks, and it was a matter of course, we come on down to more recent days, and in the Washington Post of December 3 last (it is something I have already read once, but for the purpose of the continuity of this statement I will have to repeat it) I found a long article. I have the whole of it here, but I will not republish it. It may be found in the RECORD. The statements in it are to the effect that the Republican party in 1896 raised $3,800,000 for campaign purposes; that in 1900 the Republican party raised $2,800,000, and in 1904 it raised $1,900,000.

We have already been informed, through the newspapers, of the investigation of the insurance companies by a committee of the legislature of New York. Mr. Hughes was the attorney in charge of the examination, and I have, not from the newspapers, but from an autographic letter from Mr. Hughes himself—I wrote to him and asked him to send it to me—a statement of the sums that have been contributed to the national Republican committee from those sources. In the aggregate, it is $258,000, contributed by the New York Life, the Mutual Life, the Equitable Life, the Metropolitan Life, the Prudential Life, and the Provident Savings and Life Insurance Companies in 1896, 1900, and 1904; and, if I recollect aright, the insurance companies contributed more in recent years than they did in 1896.

Then we had the speech made by Col. Andy Hamilton upon his recent spectacular or dramatic appearance before a committee in Albany, N. Y., in which he stated that he had himself paid $75,000 as a campaign contribution over and above the amounts which Mr. McCall had contributed. Further, I recall a statement by Colonel Hamilton that if the trustees who had met and hastily decided to make restitution of the $258,000, expected to stop there, they would be very much short of the amount contributed, and indicating that a very large sum, which up to that time had not been unearthed, had been contributed to the Republican campaign fund. Those matters are of course smothered up, hidden, up yonder yet, and I do not know how the Senate could get at them if it wanted to, because it has nothing to do with insurance contributions. But I note that McCurdy, or the McCurdys, I think it is, are being sued upon the civil side of the court to recover something over $2,000,000 that has been misappropriated or—I do not like to say stolen, though I like that word very well for such transactions as these.

Anyhow, I received this morning a letter which appears to me to indicate a very prolific source of information if the Senator from Rhode Island and his committee shall see fit to report to the Senate a resolution ordering an investigation. I will read some of the statements made in it. The man signs his name; he is a banker; but for private reasons down here in regard to an individual mentioned who is kin to him, but not exactly as close kin as he would feel warranted in having his name made public, he does not like to have his own name made public. I will give the name to the Senator from Rhode Island in private if he wants it, if he chooses to investigate the matter.

NEW YORK, April 16, 1906.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN.

SIR: If you wish to ascertain about campaign contributions to the Republican national committee (George B. Cortelyou, chairman, with headquarters in Chicago), if you will examine the auditor for the committee, Walter M. Anthony, I think you will find a complete list of all contributions. I think you will also find that a statement was made periodically of those who did and did not contribute, and that the chairman, as well as the President, knew who did and did not contribute, notwithstanding the public disclaimers made before election.

I think also that if you examine Mr. Root you will find that he was responsible for the appointment of Mr. Morton as the head of the Equitable, and that this move was made to head off inquiry as to the New York and Mutual Life Insurance companies, fearing the exposé as to campaign contributions.

I think you will also find, if you probe deep enough, that Governor Higgins held off through these same influences as long as he could, and that the legislative investigation was only begun fearing political consequences if not begun by the Republicans and controlled by them.

He goes on to state that "the auditor of the national committee has never told me this in so many words, but I know his careful, methodical ways," and so forth.

As I said, I will furnish the Senator from Rhode Island with the name of this man, and if he chooses to send after the auditor probably we will have some interesting information later on.

I am nearly through, Mr. President. I wish to ask permission to have incorporated some tables sent me by the Secretary of the Treasury, giving the amount of deposits and other facts relating to national banks, the capital, and all that, the sort of thing which will be interesting reading to people who choose to put two and two together and try to understand the modus operandi by which certain national banks are such great favorites with the Treasury and are allowed to hold such immense sums of national money on deposit all the while.

I send these to the desk, and would like to have them published.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the tables will be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

UNITED STATES TREASURER'S OFFICE,
DIVISION OF GENERAL ACCOUNTS,
January 29, 1906.

Mr. TILLMAN. It will be recalled that this discussion was begun in December by my getting the Senate to pass a resolution instructing the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit to the Senate all information in regard to national banks contributing to campaign funds. Here is a letter of Secretary Shaw, dated December 12, and he states that although there were on file in the Treasury Department 100,000 copies of reports of bank examiners, they have been able to discover contributions of only about $500 or something like that, in two small sums, by two small banks. I mention this to show one of two things: Either that the bank examination by the examiners is absolutely a fraud and a humbug, or that they have not made public and disclosed those facts which they should have found out if they did not. I do not care on which horn of the dilemma the committee sees fit to impale the authorities. There are two prongs there.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Did the present Comptroller undertake to report on transactions as far back as 1896?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not think he did.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Does the Senator maintain that such contributions have gone on in that way since that time?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have no evidence, but I have this idea: If the insurance companies felt compelled in 1896, in order to accomplish their political purposes by the election of President McKinley, to contribute to the Republican national committee, and then did not stop when the specter of free silver disappeared and there was no danger of the standard being bimetallic, but continued to contribute every four years to the Republican campaign fund, I do not see why the national banks should just naturally step aside and have nothing to do with it. In other words, I believe that the national banks right now are contributing toward local State campaigns wherever they are deeply concerned in the maintenance in power of a given party, and I believe a thorough and searching investigation will prove it.

The Senator from Colorado said a while ago that he thought the banks in his State had engaged actively in that sort of work in the last campaign there; and while I have no purpose of reflecting in the slightest degree on the present Secretary of the Treasury or the present Comptroller, I simply say that this is a source of information which we ought to follow up, which we ought to probe, which we ought to dig into. Examine into campaign contributions back to the Cleveland campaign, if you want to. I am willing to go back as far as that, and come right on down, and take up both political parties; go after the chairman of the Democratic national committee and the treasurer; go after the chairman of the Republican committee, and the treasurer, and the auditor. Let them take the stand and swear whether or not they received any money from these sources, and let us stop this infamy, because it is an infamy to have the ballot debauched and elections bought by these banks.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I hope the Senator will extend his resolution so as to include an investigation of the banks from 1885 to 1889.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am willing to go back to that period. I am willing to go back to 1861 or 1863, when the national banks were first inaugurated, if you want to.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. I have been told that there is some very interesting material there.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have been informed so, too. I have nothing to hide here. As I said rather verbosely in my letter to Breen, I would as leave drive a dagger home into a Democratic bosom, if it be rotten and corrupt, as I would into a Republican bosom. I am impartial in my favors of that kind.

I hope the Senator from Rhode Island when he reports the resolution, if he sees fit to do so, will incorporate in it a provision authorizing the committee to send for persons and papers and administer oaths, and also a provision authorizing the committee to go back to the beginning. I do not want any statute of limitations pleaded in favor of a Democratic rascal.

Here I have some correspondence with Mr. Charles E. Hughes, to whom I wrote a letter on February 24, asking him to send me a transcript of the testimony given before the committee by Hendricks, the superintendent of insurance, and by Vanderpoel, in which it was brought out that those two officers had spent thirty or forty thousand dollars in a pretended examination into the affairs of those insurance companies, with the result that they found absolutely nothing worth having, and it was only when the legislative committee under Mr. Hughes's manipulation got through the crust and unearthed those frauds that anything of moment was discovered. And then Mr. Hamilton comes along and says Mr. Hughes has only touched the top of it. So I imagine there must be a pretty deep cesspool of rottenness down under that insurance business yet, which my banker friend this morning says has been practically smothered up by the fact that the Republican committee was not anxious to discover anything, and that they only began the investigation in order to escape the consequences of public anger and so on. I will ask that Mr. Hughes's letter to me and the testimony which he sent be printed for the information of those who wish to read them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., February 24, 1906.

CHARLES E. HUGHES, esq.,
Attorney at Law, 56 Broadway, New York City.

DEAR SIR: Thanking you for your valuable favor of the 18th of December, I venture to ask you also to send to me a copy from the testimony showing that $30,000 was paid by the Mutual Life Insurance Company for some examinations made by the commissioner of insurance, which examinations showed none of the political contributions afterwards discovered by you.

Very respectfully, B. R. TILLMAN.

Francis Hendricks, called as a witness, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

By Mr. Hughes:

Q. You are the superintendent of insurance?—A. I am.

Q. When were you appointed superintendent?—A. I took office about the middle of February, 1900.

Q. For the purpose of advising the legislature as to insurance conditions, did you endeavor to ascertain whether, apart from the mere question of solvency, the companies were so managed that they could give the policy holders the returns to which they were justly entitled?—A. Why, Mr. Hughes, I think we have left the management of the companies in the hands of the officers of the companies.

Q. Well, is it fair to say, Mr. Hendricks, that if the department was satisfied that a company was solvent it paid virtually no attention to the question whether the management of the company was economical or extravagant?—A. Not unless they were on the—they were likely to impair their solvency.

* * * * * * *

Q. Well, let us look into matters in detail a little. According to your statement, you have examined the Mutual Life Insurance Company three times—in 1895, in 1899, and in 1903. I am informed by the Mutual Life of a payment to you as superintendent for the expenses of an examination under date of September, in 1902?—A. There was.

Q. I do not see that mentioned on the list that I have been furnished. There is probably some error in that?—A. Well, the filing of it was September 21, 1903.

Q. There apparently was another examination in 1903, for there is a payment under date of July 31, 1903, of $15,607.30.—A. I think that is the same examination, is it not?

Q. They were in two different years.

Mr. APPLETON. May I explain that to you?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly. [Mr. Hughes then consulted with Mr. Appleton.]

Q. It is suggested by Mr. Appleton that an examination will sometimes extend in the case of a large company over a considerable period, and that one branch of the business—as, for example, titles—will be examined at one time and another branch, such as securities, at another time, and payments will be made as bills are rendered from time to time.—A. I think that is so. This was one examination.

Q. So this was one examination stretched over a period of two years?—A. Yes.

Q. It appears that in 1902 and 1903 the Mutual Life paid to you as the expenses of its examination about $30,000?—A. Whatever the amount is there.

Q. That was a pretty full examination, was it not?—A. We thought it was.

Q. Just what did you do in that examination?—A. Well, you will have to ask Mr. Vanderpoel. He made the examination.

Q. Mr. Vanderpoel?—A. Yes.

Q. Who assisted Mr. Vanderpoel in making the examination?—A. I could not tell you that. He takes his own force.

Q. And that force is from your staff?—A. That force is from my staff.

Q. As detailed here?—A. Yes.

Q. Now, what do you personally, Mr. Hendricks, have to do with an examination of that description?—A. Nothing.

Q. Well, do you advise with Mr. Vanderpoel during its progress; does he report to you from time to time what he is discovering?—A. Yes; if he is——

Q. I mean aside from the formal report at the conclusion.—A. Well, he usually talks with me some about it.

* * * * * * *

Q. Now, carrying your mind back to the time of this examination of the Mutual, which extended over a year, what did you personally do in connection with it? Did you go to the offices of the Mutual Life?—A. No.

Q. Did you put any of its officers on oath?—A. No.

Q. Or any of its employees?—A. Not personally.

Q. Not personally. I am referring now to what you personally did.—A. I did not.

Q. Did you examine any records or papers,—A. Personally?

Q. Yes.—A. No.

Q. The whole matter was in the charge of Mr. Vanderpoel?—A. It was.

Q. And whatever examination was made of papers or books or vouchers was made by him and his assistants under his direction?—A. It was.

Q. Now, what, in connection with that examination, was brought to your attention with reference to the Mutual Life? Did you learn from Mr. Vanderpoel or from anyone connected with that examination that there was any extravagance in the management of the Mutual Life?—A. No.

Q. What?—A. No.

Q. Did you learn of the salaries paid to the officers of the Mutual Life?—A. I do not think so.

Q. Did you inquire into those matters?—A. I do not think so.

Q. Did you learn as to the existence of commission contracts with Charles H. Raymond & Co. or with Robert H. McCurdy?—A. No.

Q. And the nature and amount of the payments made under them?—A. I did not.

Q. You had no interviews with Mr. Vanderpoel regarding those matters?—A. No.

* * * * * * *

A. If the insurance department was to take one of these great companies and examine them as to their management he would have to go through every letter that they had written; he would have to examine every record there was there. I do not think the insurance department with ten men could examine—take the Equitable Life—and find everything there was in reference to their management of it in less than a year. And after we had got through and the chief examiner had made an affidavit of the result and he had got out, you know, why, they could take a million dollars and pay it on some loan or do anything else, and we would not know anything about it. The fact of it is, that I think you must leave the management of the companies in the hands of the directors. If they do anything wrong, punish them.

Q. Yes; and expose them.—A. And expose them, yes, for it. You see, about half of the things that have been discovered here would not be possible for us to discover.

Q. Well, it seems to me that a great deal more might be. Now, for example, you can put in accountants on the books of the New York Life or the Equitable or the Mutual and keep them in for three months before you need to take a bit of testimony. You can examine all their vouchers; you can go through every one of their accounts quietly in your office, and you can put the employees on the stand?—A. Well, we would have to have the books up to our office.

Q. Well, quietly in their office, then, to make the necessary amendment. The point is, has not the insurance department, through the traditions which have governed its practices, lived, as the saying is, far below its privileges and opportunities?—A. Possibly; and we have followed the traditions of the office.

Q. Yes. But with regard to the Mutual, I understand you did not become personally aware either of the salaries or of the irregularities in the supply department or of the irregularities of the supply department or of the irregularities in connection with the commission contracts?—A. No.

Q. Or of the syndicate operations?—A. No.

Q. Or of any of the matters which have engrossed our attention here?—A. No.

Q. And was your first information as to those matters your reading of the reports of the testimony before this committee?—A. I think that is right.

Isaac Vanderpoel, called as a witness, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

By Mr. Hughes:

Q. Mr. Vanderpoel, how long have you been connected with the insurance department?—A. Since 1870.

Q. How long have you been chief examiner?—A. Since 1895.

Q. Have you since 1895 been in charge of all the examinations of life insurance companies that have been made by the department?—A. Practically.

Q. When you undertake a full examination of a life insurance company what do you do—what is your method?—A. Well, I would examine it the same as a bank examiner examines a bank, take the condition on any date, ascertain their assets and liabilities under the law.

Q. Do you examine for the purpose of verifying the annual report?—A. In the case of most life insurance companies that has been the case.

Q. Recurring to the examination of the Mutual Life Insurance Company in 1902 or 1903, how long did that examination continue?—A. From January, 1903, to September, 1903.

Q. Did it not progress in 1902?—A. Not in 1902.

Q. I asked that because of a statement furnished by the company showing a payment to the superintendent in December, 1902, of some $9,000 and upwards in connection with an examination?—A. That may have been for the appraisal of real estate. I am not aware that we did any examination work there otherwise.

Q. How many did you have with you in the examination of the Mutual Life in 1903?—A. About twelve men.

Q. Who were they?—A. You have their names there.

Q. The list has gone to the stenographer. Can you enumerate them?—A. Do you want the full names? Silas C. Hay, Daniel F. Gordon, Frederick H. Parker, Seth C. McArthur, Richard A. Elmer, Isaac Fuld, and Mr. Mellen (since dead). Well, I had, roughly speaking, a dozen men. The names of the other five I do not recall.

Q. Were all the dozen men examiners?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How much of the period you have mentioned were they actually at work?—A. The entire period.

Q. Nine months?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did you do in connection with the work personally?—A. Well, in addition to supervising the work generally I made investigations of the books, including the securities, the purchases and sales, the examination of all their books of final account, examination of vouchers, running the same through cash and subsidiary books, finally into the ledger, from which practically all their annual statements were made up.

Q. Did you verify the report of income by the company?—A. I did.

Q. Did you find it to be as stated in their sworn report?—A. I did.

Q. How did you verify that?—A. In the manner I have stated, by making an examination of their cash book, check books—vouchers were not checked solid; the time occupied in doing so would be so long that our opportunities were somewhat limited in that direction, but I suppose we checked 20 per cent of the vouchers at random.

* * * * * * *

Q. To what extent did you examine vouchers for legal expenses?—A. Merely to see that the committee of the board of directors, having cognizance of that matter, had authorized the payment of the money and directed it to be charged to legal expenses.

Q. That whenever you found on a voucher the stamp showing the approval of the committee on expenditures, then you left it alone, that is to say, you were satisfied?—A. I was.

Q. So that so far as the examination was concerned, they could have spent any amount of money for any purpose, provided it was authorized by the committee, without awakening your criticism?—A. They could.

Q. The result is that your examination was not at all directed to the propriety of expenditures, but to the fact of expenditures?—A. To the fact of expenditures.

Q. As shown by the approval of the committee?—A. Exactly.

Q. But it really was not an audit of the expenses further than to require the production of the committee's stamp?—A. Yes.
Q. Why did you limit it in that way?—A. I always had done so.
Q. Had that been the practice in all the examinations?—A. It has.
Q. That have been made of all the companies?—A. It has.
Q. Never go behind the voucher?—A. It has.
Q. Even though the voucher does not disclose the nature of the services rendered or any detail of the services rendered, providing it is approved by the appropriate committee or the appropriate officer?—A. Yes.
Q. So if anywhere you have an official voucher of any officer or of a committee, that closes your inquiry?—A. That closes my inquiry.
Q. How long has that been so in the practice of the department?—A. So far as I know, always.
Q. From the very beginning?—A. Yes.
Q. So that in fact the examinations of the Department have been no check whatever upon waste in management; they have not been intended to be?—A. Not been intended to be.
Q. There has been no effort to ascertain whether moneys have been expended properly or improperly?—A. Not that I know of.
Q. Now, in your examination of the Mutual Life, in looking through the vouchers for legal expenses, did your eye catch payments which had been made upon vouchers of the chairman of the committee for large amounts?—A. I recall vouchers that were for round sums charged to legal expenses.
Q. That is, on the signature of the chairman of the committee on expenditures?—A. The chairman or the entire committee.
Q. Yes; without disclosing the name of the recipient or recipients of the sum or sums embraced in the total?—A. No.
Q. For example, Mr. Herrick, as chairman, $25,000, a voucher for that. Did you go behind that in any way?—A. I did not.
Q. So that if they spent in a given year, we will say, $150,000, for legal expenses, if they had the visé of the committee on expenditures for $150,000, even though there were no vouchers signed by lawyers or persons receiving the moneys, the signature of the committee or the officer would be final, so far as you were concerned?—A. It would.
Q. Did you originally inaugurate the system of examination, or was it put in force by some one who preceded you?—A. By some one who preceded me.
Q. Where did you get your original instructions as to the way in which you should examine companies?—A. I received no instructions.
Q. How did you get the idea that the examination was to be circumscribed in the manner suggested by your testimony?—A. I did it on my own volition.
Q. Did you not think it important that there should be an effort to ascertain whether the expenditures were properly made as well as the fact that they had been made?—A. I took the attitude that if the payment was authorized by the proper authority within the board of directors that I had no authority to go behind that.
Q. Then you looked at the blotter, the Mutual blotter, to see the run of the expenses, and you would examine the vouchers at random and certain proportions of them to see whether they had the stamp of approval or authority upon them, and that would complete your examination of the disbursements?—A. It would.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have nothing more, Mr. President, except an original document which Mr. Breen clipped from some printed circular, I suppose. It is headed "The American Bankers' Association, No. 2 Wall street, New York, March 23, 1896."

It is addressed to "The Bankers of the United States," and is signed by Eugene H. Pullen, James R. Branch, Joseph C. Hendrix. In it they ask the national banks of the entire country to use their influence to give practical effect to this action—that is, to prevent the gold standard from being overthrown. I will ask that it be printed as a part of the exhibits to show that Mr. Breen has opened up a prolific field of investigation which promises some very interesting results; and I have no doubt if a committee, earnestly desirous of obtaining the facts, shall be ordered by the Senate to go into the matter of these campaign contributions and send for my friend Mr. Anthony—I say my friend; I never heard of him before, but the man who sent his name to me—my friend, or rather a friend of the public, because he wants to unearth corruption—I say, if the committee shall be ordered by the Senate to send for men like him, I have no doubt results will follow.

The circular referred to is as follows:

THE AMERICAN BANKERS' ASSOCIATION,
No. 2 Wall Street, New York, March 23, 1896.

To the Bankers of the United States:

At a meeting of the executive council of the American Bankers' Association, held in this city on March 11, 1896, the following declaration was made by unanimous vote:

"The executive council of the American Bankers' Association declare unequivocally in favor of the maintenance of the existing gold standard of value, and recommend to all bankers and to the customers of all banks, the exercise of all of their influence as citizens in their various States to select delegates to the political conventions of both great parties who will declare unequivocally in favor of the maintenance of the existing standard of value."

Your influence is earnestly requested to give practical effect to this action.

EUGENE H. PULLEN,
President.
JAMES R. BRANCH,
Secretary.
JOSEPH C. HENDRIX,
Chairman Executive Committee.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have another letter from a very reliable gentleman in Chicago, stating that in 1896 he knew of $70,000 being contributed to the campaign fund by the national banks; that there were witnesses who would prove it, because he had heard them; that they were reliable gentlemen of high financial standing; that they made no secret of it.

While no one expects it, let us see if the insurance people are going to make restitution to the trust fund. I read the other day a section of the Revised Statutes which applies to this national-bank business, and I will repeat it right here:

SEC. 5209. Every president, director, cashier, teller, clerk, or agent of any association, who embezzles, abstracts, or wilfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds, or credits of the association—

There is a semicolon—

or who, without authority from the directors, issues or puts in circulation any of the notes of the association.

Therefore the "or" and the semicolon will divorce the preceding acts from the subsequent ones, where the directors give authority, and so on.

I will print section 5209, if the Senate will permit me, without reading it. I have read it twice already in the previous talks I have given here. And I give it now for the purpose of illustrating how the law expressly prohibits and punishes as a misdemeanor, with a term of imprisonment, I believe, of not less than five nor more than ten years, any misapplication, embezzlement, or abstraction of the funds of the association; and therefore, if it shall be shown that even in 1896 or in 1900 or in 1904 any of these banks did contribute in this way from the funds of their stockholders, they are guilty of a crime punishable by imprisonment. That is one reason why this resolution, which was introduced yesterday and is now being discussed, provides for a report from the committee as to whether or not any change in the banking laws is necessary to prevent in the future such transactions as these.

The section referred to is as follows:

SEC. 5209. Every president, director, cashier, teller, clerk, or agent of any association who embezzles, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds, or credits of the association, or who, without authority from the directors, issues or puts in circulation any of the notes of the association, or who, without such authority, issues or puts forth any certificate of deposit, draws any order or bill of exchange, makes any acceptance, assigns any note, bond, draft, bill of exchange, mortgage, judgment, or decree; or who makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of the association, with intent, in either case, to injure or defraud the association or any other company, body politic or corporate, or any individual person, or to deceive any officer of the association, or any agent appointed to examine the affairs of any such association; and every person who with like intent aids or abets any officer, clerk, or agent in any violation of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be imprisoned not less than five years nor more than ten.

Mr. TILLMAN. I recall also two facts in regard to recent events, one in Ohio and the other in Illinois, that are mentioned in the resolution, which appeared in the papers three or four weeks back, that the county treasurer of Hamilton County had been making restitution by returning, I do not know how much; $70,000, I think, or about that amount of money, which had been dropped around loose, left on the desk of these county treasurers by bank messengers or other agencies as a bonus or bribe ostensibly for the purpose of having the treasurer deposit county funds with a given bank. I think if that has been going on this committee ought to investigate it.

Furthermore, I saw in the papers that when John R. Walsh's bank failed in Chicago the association of national bankers there met and agreed among themselves that they would assume all of Walsh's obligations and act as receiver for his property, taking possession of his assets and agreeing to guarantee all his debts. The junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] informed me that Walsh's bank was not really bankrupt; that it will be in business again after all obligations are squared; but I noted in the numerous letters which have come to me a statement about Walsh having had control of a coal railroad that tapped the Hocking coal field, I think, or the coal fields of West Virginia; and so we have these banks dealing in railroads, dealing in real estate, consolidating to act as receiver for one of their crippled brethren.

I want to know if the national banking law contemplated any such authority or any such power in a national banking association. If so, it looks to me like somebody ought to get after them and make them obey the law.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. HOPKINS. What specific provision of law does the Senator from South Carolina contend the banks of Chicago have violated?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not contend that they have violated any, but I contend when the banks go out of banking, their legitimate business, and associate themselves together to take charge of an estate and wind it up and guarantee the debts, regardless of whether they knew that the assets were greater than the debts or not, they have gone far off from their legitimate business as bankers, and if they have not broken any law there ought to be a law to prohibit them from doing it again. That is what I contend.

Mr. HOPKINS. I think if the Senator from South Carolina was familiar with banking conditions and the methods in which banks are conducted and the men who are engaged in banking in Chicago, he would not indulge in that statement. Everybody familiar with the banking interests of Chicago is aware of the fact that no provision of the banking law has been violated by these Chicago banks, that no interests have been jeopardized, and that the so-called "Walsh bank" is not an insolvent bank, that it has met every obligation which has been presented against it, and every depositor has been paid. There are assets enough not only to pay the full value of all the stock of the bank, but to leave a million dollars besides, to be turned over to Mr. Walsh, where he has pledged his private fortune.

It seems to me that this part of the resolution which has been offered by the Senator from South Carolina is entirely unwarranted.

The Senator states something about the national banks owning a railroad. There is nothing of the kind.

Mr. TILLMAN. I said Walsh owned the railroad, and the national banks having assumed the control of his assets probably they have been selling railroads.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Walsh was interested with other gentlemen in the construction of a railroad.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will state to the Senator from Illinois that the newspapers at the time stated that the bank of which Mr. Walsh was president had violated the law on the subject of national banking by loaning more money than was authorized by the statute. I ask the Senator if he can enlighten us upon that phase of the case?

Mr. HOPKINS. Does the Senator mean the 10 per cent limitation?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I am not aware as to the character of the article the Senator from Texas refers to. I have not seen it, and of course I can not meet it as specifically as I would if the article were before me. All I know is that under the arrangement which was made by the national banks of Chicago every depositor has been paid in full and every obligation of the bank has been met. The condition of every national bank in Chicago is such that whatever money it advanced to take any part of the assets of the Chicago National Bank will be returned with interest.

Under those conditions it seems to me that it is entirely unseemly for the Senator from South Carolina to bring in a resolution of this kind when no law has been violated by the Chicago banks, and when every creditor of the Chicago National Bank is to be paid in full.

Mr. TILLMAN. I take the criticism of the Senator from Illinois in all kindliness. He says it is unseemly for me to bring in a resolution to investigate the transactions of the national banking association of Chicago in regard to its action in this Walsh bank affair. That may be his opinion. I do not object to his holding that view, but whether or not any law has been violated the committee could so report, and whether or not this transaction——

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. Whether or not this transaction is a warranted one, is a wise one, is a proper one, could be determined by this committee, and if its report is made to the Senate, showing that this transaction is perfectly legitimate and clean and fair and honorable and lawful, I will be perfectly content.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. It would be just as seemly for the Senator to offer a resolution to investigate the national banks of Chicago, because they have a clearing house in which they settle the balances of those banks every day. The arrangement that was made by the Chicago banks was through the clearing house, and is a procedure similar to that to protect the interest of all the banks and all the depositors of the banks. I am sure if the Senator had been as familiar with the subject as he ought to have been he never would have presented a resolution of this kind. The action of the national banks, instead of being a subject of investigation and criticism, is a matter in which they should be commended for the prompt and energetic and patriotic manner in which they met the exigency there.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is the Senator's view. He lives close by Chicago or in it. He has a right undoubtedly to express his opinion, and so have I. I may be ignorant, and, I confess, on many things I am. But I am a little doubtful of the propriety and wisdom, and also of the business sense, of a lot of banks undertaking to guarantee the obligation of a defunct bank without knowing whether or not the assets would equal the debts.

Mr. HOPKINS. There is the fatal trouble with the Senator from South Carolina. They did nothing of the kind. They had a committee appointed to go over the assets of the bank, and they knew before they entered into any arrangement at all that the assets were not only sufficient to pay all the liabilities of the bank, but to leave a million dollars besides.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then how did this bank get into bankruptcy? How came it to get out of the hands of its owner and of those who had a right to control and manage its affairs, and to be turned over to this national banking association?

Mr. HOPKINS. That bank has not gone into the hands of a receiver. It is not an insolvent bank and never was insolvent. The question was that it had a lot of assets which were good, but were not what the bankers call "quick assets," and in order to provide quick assets the other banks of Chicago took these assets of the bank, that were absolutely good, and that are proven to be good, and furnished the money for them. In other words, they took bonds and stock and obligations that were held by the Chicago National Bank that they knew were absolutely good and advanced money for them, for which they are receiving interest, and the stockholders of their banks will get the benefit of it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Nevertheless, Mr. President, did Mr. Walsh retain control of his own bank?

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Walsh resigned and his board of directors resigned. A new president was elected and a new board of directors was elected.

Mr. TILLMAN. Who elected them?

Mr. HOPKINS. The stockholders elected them precisely as they elect in any other place. The directors in that bank to-day are Mr. James B. Forgan, Mr. Orson Smith, Mr. Byron L. Smith, Mr. James H. Eckels, who the Senator will remember was Comptroller of the Currency here once, one of the ablest and most efficient Comptrollers that this country has ever had, and Mr. John J. Mitchell, the head of the Illinois Trust and Savings Bank, five of the leading financiers not only of Chicago, but of the entire country, and the management of the bank has been such as to reflect not only credit upon them, but upon the banking system that is adopted and followed in the city of Chicago.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator would indicate that Mr. John R. Walsh's bank was entirely solvent, and that this proceeding has nothing in it that would need investigation. Has Mr. Walsh been indicted by the grand jury or anything like that?

Mr. HOPKINS. No, sir; he has not.

Mr. TILLMAN. He has not?

Mr. HOPKINS. No, sir.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not know anything to the contrary, but I got a note from the press gallery, and those people know a great deal more about this thing than either the Senator or I.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the Senator is relying upon evidence of that kind it shows the absolute hollowness of his information, and I would recommend——

Mr. TILLMAN. Nevertheless, I still contend that it is a perfectly legitimate matter of inquiry for the Committee on Finance, dealing as it has to do and charged with the responsibility of controlling and watching the national banking system, to inquire into the Chicago Bank transaction. If the Senator feels aggrieved he will have to stay aggrieved, so far as I am concerned. I believe I am absolutely justified in asking the Senate to pass such a resolution. The resolution will, of course, go to the Committee on Finance——

Mr. HOPKINS. It is not a question of my being aggrieved; but it is a question of the Senator having full and accurate information before he attempts to press a resolution here in the Senate of the United States reflecting upon these great banking interests of the city of Chicago. That is what I protest against.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is it any reflection on the banking interest of Chicago for me to ask the Committee on Finance to investigate the fact that John R. Walsh's bank went dead somehow or other, and out of business, could not pay, and that these other banks——

Mr. HOPKINS. If every depositor has been paid in full, if every creditor of the bank has had his obligation met, what interest has the Senator from South Carolina with the local affairs in Chicago?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have no interest in it.

Mr. HOPKINS. Why is he so disturbed because nobody has lost a dollar?

Mr. TILLMAN. Somebody must have lost some money or this thing would not have happened.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, perhaps if the Senator would send to the press gallery and get a note from that reporter he might get some information upon that point. I should like——

Mr. TILLMAN. It may be that I will give the Senator some additional information before we get through with this thing.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the Senator give the name of that reporter?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is not signed.

Mr. HOPKINS. It is anonymous?

Mr. TILLMAN. No; he did not have time to sign it; he was in such a hurry to get it to me. [Laughter and manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair must inform the occupants of the galleries that manifestations are not permitted under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. All I want to do is to have the Senate determine, or to have the Committee on Finance determine, whether or not these transactions in Cincinnati and in Illinois are subjects for investigation. I hope the Senator agrees with me that banks ought to be prohibited from contributing any more money to elect Republican Representatives in Congress.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, the Senator knows that I favor a bill of the character that he presented to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I want honest elections everywhere, and I should like and trust that they will be as honest and as full and as fair and as free in South Carolina as I know them to be in Illinois.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the resolution goes to the Calendar, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is the suggestion I was going to make.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Finance:

H. R. 8973. An act to amend section 5200, Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to national banks; and

H. R. 17453. An act for the withdrawal from bond, tax free, of domestic alcohol when rendered unfit for beverage or liquid medicinal uses by mixture with suitable denaturing materials.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

H. R. 11796. An act for the diversion of water from the Sacramento River, in the State of California, for irrigation purposes; and

H. R. 14508. An act permitting the building of dams across the north and south branches of Rock River, adjacent to Vandruffs Island and Carrs Island, and across the cut-off between said islands, in Rock Island County, Ill., in aid of navigation and for the development of water power.

H. R. 14604. An act forbidding the importation, exportation, or carriage in interstate commerce of falsely or spuriously stamped articles of merchandise made of gold or silver or their alloys, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

H. R. 15911. An act to amend the laws of the United States relating to the registration of trade-marks was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

H. R. 18025. An act to regulate shipping in trade between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, between ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

COLUMBIA RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

An act (H. R. 17987) making an appropriation for the improvement of the mouth of the Columbia River was read twice by its title.

Mr. FULTON. That is the same as the bill which passed the Senate a few days ago.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FULTON. It will take no time. The same bill passed the Senate a few days ago, except it is a House bill. The House reported from the committee exactly the same bill in the form of a House bill, and I ask immediate consideration for it, as it has once passed both Houses unanimously.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FULTON. I understand it is in order to move to recall the Senate bill from the House in order that it may be indefinitely postponed. I make that motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon enters a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 4952) making an appropriation for the improvement of the mouth of the Columbia River was passed, and asks that the House be requested to return the bill. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the hour of 2 o'clock arrived and cut off all further consideration of the resolution introduced by the Senator from South Carolina before I got an opportunity to say anything about the banks of Ohio that are referred to in his resolution. I do not want now, when the unfinished business has been laid before the Senate and Senators are anxious to proceed with the discussion of it, to take any time to say what I had it in mind to say, but I will, if the Senate will indulge me to the extent of a sentence or two, say that so far as the charge the Senator refers to as to those banks is concerned, and the desirability of investigating them, I have no objection whatever. I know nothing about the practice named beyond what has appeared in the newspapers and what is set forth in the Senator's resolution. But so far as contributions for political purposes by the national banks of Ohio are concerned I think the Senator has a very exaggerated idea of what the facts may be.

I have had a pretty familiar acquaintance with what has been going on in the politics of Ohio during the last thirty years, and in all that time I think I can safely say that except only in 1896 I do not believe any national bank ever made a contribution to any campaign. If they did I never heard of it. There may have been some exceptions, but certainly the rule has been as I have stated.

Mr. TILLMAN. Did the Senator hear of any that year?

Mr. FORAKER. In 1896, as I stated to the Senator in the committee, and as I have stated on the floor of the Senate on one or two different occasions, I heard that some campaign contributions were being made by national banks to the national Republican campaign committee. But I have no knowledge on the subject. I did not have then. I think every moneyed institution in the country was making contributions to the national Republican campaign committee, and if I had been connected with a moneyed institution I would have felt like contributing something myself. The moneyed institutions all over the country were doing it. Whether it is right or not I am not going into a discussion of, for we are all agreed that the practice, if there is any such practice, should be broken up and prevented by proper legislation. But that was a time of an exceptional character. Men felt keenly, men were alarmed, and there were contributions of that kind, as I then understood.

I had no relations then to the national campaign committee; I have never had any such relation at any time. I never had any personal knowledge of what was contributed. I have always regretted that so much money was contributed. I am sorry any was contributed in the last campaign. There was no necessity for it. I was of that opinion before the campaign came on, and we all plainly saw there was no necessity after the campaign was over.

But there is no time to elaborate. What I wanted to say was that I believe if an investigation should be made it would disclose that the national banks and the other banks of Ohio have never been in the habit of making contributions to campaign funds.

Mr. FOSTER obtained the floor.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. FOSTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution regarding House bill 5976, which came from the House yesterday afternoon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives. The resolution was read yesterday. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I think that the resolution should be amended before an agreement is had, and I call attention——

Mr. CLAPP. Then I withdraw it. I do not want to take the time of the Senator from Louisiana.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will lie on the table. The Senator from Louisiana will proceed.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, the subject-matter of this bill is justly regarded by many as the most momentous question that has engaged the attention of the Congress for more than a quarter of a century. In some form it affects the welfare of every man and woman and child within the borders of our country. No fortune is too great nor home too humble not to feel its force. For the first time in their history the American people are confronted with the spectacle of their Government seeking to regulate one of the factors in its economic system, whose fiscal strength is greater than that of the Government itself, barring the right to coin money; whose gross annual income exceeds by many hundreds of millions of dollars the revenue which the Government derives from all sources, and whose officers, agents, and employees constitute a force three times greater than the Federal Government employs in all branches of its executive civil service and the Army and Navy combined.

Affecting every branch of enterprise and industry in the country, touching vast and comprehensive interests, involving grave legislative and constitutional questions, and bearing upon the welfare of all the people, it is but just and proper that legislation of such scope should be approached in a spirit commensurate with the magnitude and importance of the interests involved. Its consideration should invoke the highest efforts of patriotic endeavor, and no political or partisan bias or prejudice should influence our judgment or determine our action. I trust I shall approach the discussion of this question in this spirit.

I shall consider, first, the conditions in our industrial life which, from time to time, have demanded such legislation, and briefly sketch the history of the movement which has culminated in the present measure; second, the power of Congress to pass such legislation, and, third, the wisdom, the importance, and the necessity of governmental control of common carriers as provided in this bill. And in this consideration I shall not enter into a discussion of the minutiæ or details of the question, but limit myself to a treatment of the general purposes and objects of the measure.

In 1885, as a result of the agitation of this same question, the Senate of the United States adopted a resolution appointing a select body, known as the Cullom Committee, to investigate and report upon the subject of the regulation and management of railroads in respect to interstate commerce. After months of patient labor this committee submitted a report in which it summarized the complaints against the railroad practices of the United States, stating, among other complaints, that the local rates were unnecessarily high as compared with through rates; that both local and through rates were unnecessarily high at noncompetitive points, either from the absence of competition or in consequence of pooling arrangements which restrict its operation; that unjustifiable discriminations were constantly made between individuals in the rates charged for like service under similar circumstances; that unreasonable discriminations were made between localities similarly situated; that the effect of the prevailing policy of railroad management was to establish a system of special or secret rates, rebates, drawbacks, and concessions calculated to foster monopoly and to enrich favorite shippers, and that such favoritism and secrecy introduced elements of uncertainty into legitimate business that greatly retarded the development of our industrial system; that differences in the classifications in different parts of the country, and in certain cases for shipments over the same roads in different directions, were made the means of extortion; that the capitalization and bonded indebtedness of the roads largely exceeded the cost of their actual construction or their proper value, and that unreasonable rates were charged in the effort to pay dividends on watered stocks and interest on bonds improperly issued; that railroad corporations had improperly engaged in lines of industries entirely distinct from that of transportation, and that undue advantage had been afforded to business enterprises in which the railroad officials were interested; that the common law failed to afford adequate remedies for such grievances, and that in case of dispute the shipper was compelled to submit to the decision of the railroad management or run the risk of incurring further losses by greater discrimination.

Following this report, what is known as the Cullom act was enacted into law. The debate on this measure was one of the most able and instructive that has ever taken place in Congress and was participated in by some of the ablest statesmen of that or any other day. That debate discloses the fact that many, if not all, the objections now urged against the passage of this bill were likewise urged against that measure. It was then denied, as now, that Congress had the power to pass such a measure. It was claimed that great financial disturbances would follow its passage; it was specially urged, just as now, that the charges made by public carriers were lower in this country than any other, and that the fixing of tariffs was such an involved and complicated process that none but the railroads themselves could properly adjust them. In spite of all these objections and dire forebodings, the measure was passed. Its constitutionality was sustained. An era of industrial activity followed, marked by a period of railroad development and construction the like of which was never before witnessed in this country. This law, however, failed to meet and check the evils of railroad practice, and in 1903 Congress passed what is known as the Elkins bill, which was specially directed against discriminations and rebates and other malpractices of the roads. It will be remembered that at the time of the passage of the Elkins bill similar legislation to that we now have under consideration was being urged and pressed upon Congress, and that the bill was passed largely as a compromise measure, believing that it would afford adequate remedies for the evils complained of.

Notwithstanding the laws enacted on this subject looking to the correction of these unjust and now unlawful practices, we are to-day confronted with almost the identical conditions which were so forcibly portrayed in the Cullom report, and the demand for remedial legislation is as great now, if not greater, than at that time. The bill under consideration seeks as far as possible to meet the conditions as set forth in that report, and provide an efficient remedy for the prevailing evils.

It is a grievous mistake to conclude that the consideration of this great question is the result of any idle or passing clamor of an excited or thoughtless people, or that it has its birth in the iconoclastic appeal of the public agitator or demagogue. This movement is not born amid the fierce storms of political strife or popular passion, but rather in the peaceful abode of commerce and in the sober judgment of the conservative forces of the American people. Its origin is not of to-day, of yesterday, or of a year, but can be traced back through many years, accumulating additional strength and power as the years pass by.

Nor will it do in the treatment of this subject to act upon the hypothesis that the socialistic forces of the country are behind the movement. No greater mistake could be made, and no greater error can be committed. The agitation of this question springs from the industrial and economic conditions which modern business methods have evolved. Behind it are the great conservative forces of the land. The farmer with the products of his field, the manufacturer with the products of his factory, the merchant, the miner, the producer, and the consumer are all demanding of their Government that it place some restrictions upon and exercise some regulative power over the vast railroad corporations whose operations affect, directly or indirectly, their welfare and interest. Cities and municipalities, localities and districts, are alike appealing for some legislation by which all may have a square deal and an equal opportunity in the great struggle of business and commercial life. All that is asked, and what the people have a right to demand, is that the highways of commerce shall be opened to all upon equal terms, and that for the same service, under similar conditions, like and similar charges shall be made to all alike.

It is equally as great a mistake to assert that these demands spring from any hostility toward the railroads. All admit the manifold blessings and the wonderful development which have resulted from railroad construction and enterprise; but while it is true that these corporations have done much for the country, yet, on the other hand, the Government has done and is still doing much for them. Millions and millions of dollars, almost without end, in the way of franchises, rights of way, and exemptions from taxation, have been granted to these corporations. The Government has donated them an area of public lands almost as large as was the country itself at the time we entered the family of nations—a total of 55,273,560 acres, representing an area larger than the combined size of the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and Georgia, and enough in addition to make a State larger than Massachusetts, while the liberal compensation made by the Government for any service which these roads may render has become proverbial, and is aptly illustrated by the appropriation approximating $50,000,000 made for carrying the mails last year. I cite these instances merely to show that there has not been, and is not now, any disposition, wish, or purpose on the part of the country to cripple these enterprises in their legitimate operation or in any manner dwarf their splendid development.

The proposition involved in governmental regulation or control over railroad rates has nothing new or startling in it. It has been an ever-present subject in the minds of the thoughtful and leading men in this country since railroads assumed the importance and attitude that they now bear and have borne for years to the public interest and the private fortunes of the people.

President Garfield, in a report to the House of Representatives, of which he was then a member, on December 16, 1878, with almost prophetic vision saw the coming of the time when this question would have to be settled by Congress. He said:

I am persuaded that the next great question to be confronted will be that of corporations and their relations to the people and national life. The theory is now entertained by many of our best men that national and State legislatures of the Union in creating these vast corporations have evoked a power greater than the legislatures themselves. The rapidity with which the railroad corporations have consolidated during the last year is not the least manifestation of this power.

These consolidations, as I expect to show further on, constitute one of the great, overpowering, and commanding reasons why the Government should exercise some of its regulative powers over these vast interests.

President Grant in his message to Congress in 1872 used the following language:

The attention of Congress will be called during its present session to the various enterprises for the more certain and cheaper transportation of the constantly increasing surplus of Western and Southern products to the Atlantic seaboard. The subject is one that will force itself upon the legislative branch of the Government sooner or later, and I suggest, therefore, that immediate steps be taken to gain all available information to insure equable and just legislation.

Just as President Grant stated in this message, the subject is one that is now forcing itself upon the legislative branch of our Government, and it is an issue which must be met.

On the same subject President Arthur, in his message to Congress on December 4, 1882, used the following language:

The regulation of interstate commerce has already been the subject of your deliberation. One of the incidents of the marvelous extension of the railway system of the country has been the adoption of such measures by the corporations which own or control the roads as has tended to impair the advantages of healthy competition and to make hurtful discriminations in the adjustment of freightage. Those inequalities have been corrected in several of the States by appropriate legislation, the effect of which has necessarily been restricted to the limits of their own territory. So far as such mischiefs affect commerce between these States or between any one of these States and a foreign country, they are the subjects of national concern, and Congress alone can afford relief.

And I call attention again to the extremely forcible message on this subject, of December 4, 1884, of President Arthur. He said:

Complaints have lately been numerous and urgent that certain corporations controlling in whole or in part the facilities for the interstate carriage of persons and merchandise over the great railroads of the country have resorted in their dealings with the public to diverse measures, unjust and oppressive in their character. In some instances the State governments have attacked and suppressed these evils, but in others they have been unable to afford adequate relief because of the jurisdictional limitations which are imposed on them by the Federal Constitution. The question how far the National Government may lawfully interfere in the premises, and what, if any, supervision and control it ought to exercise, is one which merits your careful consideration. While we can not fail to recognize the importance of the vast railway systems of the country and their great and beneficial influences upon the development of our material wealth, we should, on the other hand, remember that no individual and no corporation ought to be invested with absolute power over the interests of another citizen or class of citizens. The right of these railway corporations to a fair and profitable return upon their investments and reasonable freedom in their regulation must be recognized, but it seems only just that, so far as its constitutional authority will permit, Congress should protect the people at large in their interstate traffic against acts of injustice which the State governments are powerless to prevent.

President Cleveland, in his first annual message, December 8, 1885, said:

The construction of their transcontinental lines of railways, all in successful operation, wholly within our own territory and uniting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans has been accompanied by results of a most interesting and intricate nature, and has created new conditions, not in the routes of commerce only but in political geography, which powerfully affects our relations toward and necessarily increase our interests in any trans-Isthmian route which may be opened and employed for the ends of peace and traffic, or in other contingencies for uses inimical to both.

Transportation is a factor in the course of commodities scarcely second to that of their production, and weighs as heavily upon the consumer. Our experience already has proven the great importance of having competition between land carriage and water carriage fully developed, each acting as a protestant to the public against the tendencies to monopoly which are inherent in the consolidation of wealth and power in the hands of vast corporations.

In his message of December 6, 1886, President Cleveland said:

By a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States it has been adjudged that the laws of the several States are inoperative to regulate rates of transportation upon railroads if such regulation interferes with the rates of carriage from one State to another. This important field of control and regulation having been thus left entirely unoccupied, the expediency of Federal action upon the subject is worthy of consideration.

Upon being returned to the Presidency, Mr. Cleveland had occasion to say, ten years later, in his message to Congress of December 7, 1896:

The Interstate Commerce Commission has during the last year supplied abundant evidence of its usefulness and the importance of the work committed to its charge. Public transportation is a universal necessity, and the question of just and reasonable charges therefor has become of vital importance, not only to shippers and carriers but also to the vast multitude of producers and consumers. The justice and equity of the principles embodied in the existing law, passed for the purpose of regulating these charges, are everywhere conceded, and there appears to be no question that the policy thus entered upon has a permanent place in our legislation. As the present statute when enacted was in the nature of the case more or less experimental, it was hardly to be expected to supply a complete and adequate system. While its wholesome effects are manifest and have amply justified its enactment, it is evident that all desired reforms in transportation have not been fully accomplished. In view of the judicial interpretation which some provisions of this statute have received and the defects disclosed by the efforts made for its enforcement, its revision and amendment appear to be essential, to the end that it may more effectually reach the evils designed to be corrected. I hope the recommendations of the Commission upon this subject will be promptly and favorably considered by Congress.

President Roosevelt, recognizing that these evils incident to the transportation system of the country have gone on with accelerated progress during the past few years, has been even more emphatic and specific in his recommendations to Congress. In his last message he uses the following language:

Above all else we must strive to keep the highways of commerce open to all on equal terms, and to do this it is necessary to put a stop to all rebates. Whether the shipper or the railroad is to blame makes no difference; the rebates must be stopped; the abuses of the private car and private terminal track and sidetrack systems must be stopped; and the legislation of the Fifty-eighth Congress which declares it to be unlawful for any person or corporation to offer, grant, give, solicit, accept, or receive any rebate, concession, or discrimination in respect of the transportation of any property of interstate or foreign commerce, whereby such property shall by any device whatever be transported at a less rate than that named in the tariff published by the carrier, must be enforced. For some time after the enactment of the act to regulate commerce it remained a mooted question whether that act conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power after it had found a challenged rate to be unreasonable to declare what thereafter should prima facie be a reasonable maximum rate for the transportation in dispute. The Supreme Court finally resolved that question in the negative, so that as the law now stands the Commission simply possesses the bare power to denounce a particular rate as unreasonable. While I am of the opinion that it would be undesirable, if it were not impracticable, primarily to clothe the Commission with general authority to fix railroad rates, I do believe that as a fair security to shippers the Commission should be vested with the power when a given rate has been challenged, after full hearing found to be unreasonable to decide, subject to judicial review, what shall be a reasonable rate to take its place, the ruling of the Commission to take effect immediately and to obtain, unless until reversed by a court of review. The Government must in an increasing degree supervise and regulate the workings of railways engaged in interstate commerce, and such increased supervision is the only alternative to an increase of the present evils on the one hand or a still more radical policy on the other.

In my judgment the most important legislative act now needed, as regards the regulation of corporations, is this act to confer on the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to revise rates and regulations, the revised rate to go at once into effect and to stay in effect unless and until the court of review reverses it.

Steamship companies engaged in interstate commerce and protected in our coastwise trade should be held to a strict observance of the interstate-commerce act.

I make these quotations from the messages of the foremost men of our country to show that the regulation of railways has been an ever-present problem of commanding interest; Democratic and Republican Presidents alike, amid the many great public questions pressing upon their time and attention involving the policies of the two great parties and the maintenance and establishment of the principles upon which those parties are based, have found time to turn aside from great national and international questions and address themselves to this great domestic problem which touches so closely the varied and multiplying interests of our country. I call special attention to the message of President Cleveland in 1896, wherein he states that the law of 1887, creating the Commission, was largely experimental in its nature and hardly expected to form a complete and adequate system for the correction of all the evils complained of, especially in view of the judicial interpretation given to that act and the defects which its enforcement discovered.

The legislation under discussion is largely to supply, as far as possible, a remedy for the defects in the present law, referred to by President Cleveland and made more prominent and imperative by the recommendations of President Roosevelt. Since the decision of the Supreme Court determining the powers of the Commission bills have been introduced in every Congress, at every session, in deference to public demand, seeking in some way to remedy the defects in the present law in order that existing evils might be corrected. During the last two sessions of Congress and even during the recess thereof the widest and most comprehensive investigation of the subject has been held by the committees of both Houses. During that time the subject has enlisted attention and discussion in every quarter of the country. The metropolitan journals, the periodicals, and the press generally have discussed the question in all of its phases and details; professors, financiers, students of political economy, publicists, railroad officials, the bench and the bar have entered the arena of public discussion, treated the question in all of its various bearings, and thrown much light upon it. All of this discussion and publicity has but strengthened the demand for this legislation.

The bill which we have under discussion comes from the House of Representatives with the almost unanimous vote of that great representative branch of the Government as embodying the will of the House, after its members, comprising some of the most thoughtful statesmen, ablest jurists, and most unselfish patriots in the land, had full and ample opportunity to read and judge and investigate the subject in all of its bearings. Recognizing that this question rose above party rancor or political differences, the representatives of the two great parties, forgetting the bitterness of past struggles and the certainty of future differences, united in the construction and formation of this measure, which they present to the Senate as their plan for meeting the needs, demands, and requirements of the country. While it is true that this body, representing the States of the American Union, is not expected to subordinate its honest judgment or to be swerved from the conscientious performance of its high duties by the action of the coordinate branch of Congress, yet it must be conceded that in the consideration of a measure of this vast magnitude, involving the policy of this Government upon a great economic and industrial problem, the deliberations of the House are entitled to the greatest respect and most profound consideration.

The central proposition involved in this measure and the one which has provoked the fiercest opposition is found in section 15, which reads as follows:

That the Commission is authorized and empowered, and it shall be its duty, whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made as provided in section 13 of this act, or upon complaint of any common carrier, it shall be of the opinion that any of the rates, or charges whatsoever, demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers, subject to the provisions of this act, for the transportation of persons or property as defined in the first section of this act, or that any regulations or practices whatever of such carrier or carriers affecting such rates, are unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any provisions of this act, to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such cases as the maximum to be charged, and what regulation or practice in respect to such transportation is just, fair, and reasonable to be thereafter followed; and to make an order that the carrier shall cease and desist from such violation and to the extent to which the Commission find the same to exist, and shall not thereafter publish, demand, or collect any rate or charge for such transportation in excess of the maximum rate or charge so prescribed, and shall conform to the regulation or practice so prescribed. Such order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier, and shall remain in force and be observed by the carrier, unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

This section is the crux of the measure, and the storm center around which has raged this great contest. It carries with it a new departure in our Government. It provides for the first time in the history of our legislation for governmental control and regulation of these vast corporations and submits to governmental supervision and correction the rate-making power of the public carriers. It presents the question of governmental control and regulation of railroads fairly and squarely before Congress, and we are face to face with that issue. I am so firmly persuaded that nothing short of such regulation will satisfy the demands of the situation that I am willing to forego any objections I may have to other provisions of the bill in order to secure its adoption; for it is my firm conviction that a failure to pass this legislation will give impetus and additional encouragement to the demand for Government ownership of all public utilities.

It will be remembered that for the first ten years following the creation of the Commission it exercised practically the same authority as is conferred by this section, and its rulings were generally observed. There were no disastrous consequences or financial disturbances resulting from such exercise of authority, nor was there any depression in railroad construction, but on the contrary a most marvelous development followed.

But in 1897 the Supreme Court of the United States, in what is known as the Maximum Rate case, decided that the Commission had no authority to substitute a rate for one condemned, and that the order of the Commission prescribing a rate for the future could have no other force upon the carrier than a recommendation. The Commission at once, therefore, ceased to have any restraining influence on the railroads, which have never since failed to berate its efficiency or to refuse to obey its recommendations when they would work any loss, hardship, or inconvenience to the roads themselves. The evils resulting from the encroachment of the roads following that decision are clearly indicated in the reports of the Industrial Commission to the Fifty-seventh Congress, in which it is stated that—the immediate effect of this decision was to prevent any enforcement of orders relative to rates by the Commission. The carriers immediately refused to obey any orders which the Commission issued for the redress of grievances. This policy has been manifested with increasing clearness during the five years subsequent to the decision. It has become more and more certain that the denial of the right, not only to pass upon the reasonableness of a particular rate, but to prescribe what rate should supersede it, means the abolition of all control whatever. The entire inadequacy of rate-making legislation dependent upon the mere determination of rates as applied in the past without reference to the rates which shall prevail in the future is apparent on all sides. More than this, all remedies for the parties who have borne the burden of an unreasonable rate would seem to have been removed.

Relieved from apprehension of any practical restrictions by the Interstate Commerce Commission, since that body, while free to recommend, was powerless to enforce its rulings, and knowing from experience that there was little to fear from recourse to the common law on the part of the injured or wronged shipper, the roads were not long in lapsing into their old offenses, nor the people long in discovering that wrongs were being secretly and openly practiced. Again, there was inaugurated the secret, cowardly, and dishonorable practice of giving favored rates to certain communities and individuals through which huge criminal fortunes were accumulated on the one hand, while on the other individual effort was paralyzed and private enterprises were wrecked and ruined.

Mr. President, the rebate practice has no part in the honest and honorable conduct of any railroad operation. It has no defense either in the laws of trade and transportation nor in the ethics of business competition. The shippers denounce it; the railroad men denounce it; the courts of justice denounce it; the laws of Congress denounce it, and yet it is flagrantly and defiantly practiced. The extent to which it prevails, as shown by the investigations and prosecutions of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Department of Justice, is sufficient to excite the indignation of every advocate of fair play and a square deal, and if necessary the whole civil and criminal power of this Government should be used to suppress it. The extent of this violation is well described in the correspondence of the President with ex-Secretary Morton at the time of the Atchison Rebate case, so called. In that letter the President said in his usual terse and vigorous language:

At the time when you gave this testimony the interstate-commerce law in the matter of rebates was practically a dead letter. Every railroad man admitted privately that he paid no heed whatever to it, and the Interstate Commerce Commission has shown itself absolutely powerless to secure this heed. When I took up the matter and endeavored to enforce obedience to the law on the part of the railroads in the question of rebates, I encountered violent opposition from the great bulk of the railroad men and the refusal by all to whom I spoke to testify in public to the very state of affairs which they freely admitted to me in private. You alone stated that you would do all in your power to break up the system of giving rebates; that you strongly objected to it, but that as long as the law was a dead letter the railroads which preferred to obey it were forced to disobey it if they were to continue in business at all under the competition of their less scrupulous fellows.

I agreed with you cordially that the only way in which it would be possible to secure the enforcement of the law would be by making it effective against all railroads alike, as, if some were allowed to violate it, it necessarily meant that the others in self-protection would be driven to violate it also; and I can not too heartily commend the fearless and frank way in which you, and you alone, came forward and in the interest of the Government and the public gave legal evidence of the facts which everyone in interest privately admitted to exist, but which the Interstate Commerce Commission had previously been unable legally to establish.

The Attorney-General in his last report uses the following language:

Officials of railroads have in general terms assured me of their willingness to aid the Department in every way in enforcing the provisions of the law against rebates, discriminations, and departures from published rates, but have declined to render the only assistance that would be of the slightest value, namely, the furnishing of evidence proving the offense. To every case of this kind there are two guilty parties. The Department has been, and is, willing to accept the evidence either of the shipper or of the railroad official, giving him the immunity from prosecution which would result from the use of the evidence, and to proceed by indictment against the other guilty party. But, for reasons which will be appreciated by all, men have shrunk from betraying their confederates. The case, therefore, in which evidence has been or will be obtained, is occasional and exceptional, and unless we are content to allow the evil of the discriminatory practice by some carriers to continue, with now and then a punishment of a detected crime, some remedy which reaches deeper than any law now upon the statute book must be found.

The Interstate Commerce Commission and the Department of Justice, by the exercise of the utmost diligence, can discover and prohibit or punish only a small percentage of discriminatory practices which actually exist. It seems probable that the direct payment of rebates in money has largely diminished. It is alleged to be true, and the evidence before this Department, so far as it goes, tends to support the allegation, that, though clothed and disguised by various devices, the practice of giving one shipper preferential treatment over another in like situation, in substance, still contizues.

If the power, upon complaint, to fix a future maximum rate and put it into effect within a reasonable time, subject to appeal to the courts, should be given to some administrative body created by Congress, a weapon against discriminatory practices, much more potent than any now available, would be put in the hands of the Government. Upon proof that a lower rate has been given to some preferential shipper, the body clothed with the power to fix a maximum rate might well determine that the rate which the railroad could afford to give to the preferred shipper it could afford to give to all shippers in like situation. Such a finding, it could be predicted with certainty, the courts upon appeal would not reverse, for no better evidence of the legality and justice of the rate thus fixed could be found than in the action of the carrier itself. It would be difficult for the carrier to maintain that a rate actually charged by it was confiscatory or unjust.

Notwithstanding the existence of these practices, one would almost conclude from the evidence given before the committee that they had no place in railroad management. It is my judgment, Mr. President, that the railroads are not only guilty of practicing rebates, discriminatory and preferential charges, but are equally guilty in many instances of exacting unreasonably high charges.

I fully indorse the statement of a recent writer when he says the increase of freight rates, even on standard or high-grade traffic, has been most unevenly distributed. In fact, the inequality or unscientific distribution of the increase constitutes a serious ground of complaint at the present time. Few of the changes have been made by directly increasing the tariffs. That was the crude way by which the carriers had ineffectually sought in previous years to arrest the downward course of rates. These new changes have not only been subtle, they have been effected in many cases by means which emphasize the irresistible power of the railroads over the public, provided they all act together.

The greater part of the increase has been made by changes in the classification. Goods enjoying third-class rate have been lifted into the second class, and so on. Inasmuch as classification is effected not by individual railroads but by the associated railroads through large territories, unity of action has been as effectually secured as if it had been done by the chairman of a railroad pool.

Besides changes in classification, additional burdens have been laid upon the shipper by many other devices. Almost universally, the maximum carload rating has been increased. Traffic by the carload is carried for much less than in car lots. In many instances the shipper who formerly enjoyed carload rates for the shipment of 24,000 pounds now finds that he must pay on a minimum lading of 30,000 pounds. By the abolition of demurrage, by the prohibition of free storage, privileges and cars, by seeking to withdraw return transportation for cattlemen, by the increase in the charges for switching and terminal delivery, by increased fees for icing refrigerator cars, for feeding or bedding stock, have the total charges been increased. And great restlessness among the shipping public has been engendered as a result—a restlessness not so much conditioned by the mere magnitude of the charges, many of which are justified by the generally increased cost of operation, as by the fact that they indicate indubitably the utter impotence of the shipper when the carriers all agree to act in unity.

The truth that most rates are reasonable and low is no better reason for refusing a remedy for those that are wrong than is the fact that most men are peaceful and honest—a sufficient reason against the laws for the punishment of larceny and murder. Reparation as provided for in the present law serves neither a preventive nor cure. It is no protection against extortion, discrimination, or unreasonable rates, nor is it in any sense an adequate remedy to the wronged producer or consumer. There is for him but one safeguard which the Government may offer in its effort to regulate interstate commerce, and that one is a correction of a rate found after investigation to be unreasonable.

Transportation is not a luxury that may be dispensed with or enjoyed according to taste. It is everywhere a constant necessity. It substantially and materially affects every interest, every section, and everybody. It has made possible on the one hand the general development and growth of our country. It has, on the other hand, been the hotbed of discrimination and resultant trusts and monopolies, with their natural evils, the like of which surpass their kind in any other period of history.

After a calm and dispassionate analysis of all the evidence brought before the Interstate Commerce Committee, and the facts of the case as it is presented to me, it is my deliberate judgment that notwithstanding the statutes denounce the practice of rebates, discriminations, and unjustly preferential charges, these practices do exist and the country has just grounds to complain of the inequality, injustice, and wrongs resulting from these violations of the law, and that the present remedies for the control and correction of these unlawful practices are wholly inadequate and inefficient.

Congressional rate making is impracticable if not impossible. Individuals are helpless to prevent these abuses. Competition, the natural regulator and adjuster of freight rates, has disappeared, and the courts can not be clothed with the legislative function of rate making. Therefore section 15 addresses itself to my judgment as a substantial and effective remedy for the correction of the wrongs so generally and justly complained of. I believe every Senator in this Chamber admits that some legislation on this subject is imperative, and up to the present time, excluding the plan of the Senator from Ohio, no other legislation or remedy has been suggested.

Mr. President, the American people wish this Congress to be as fair and as just in its treatment of the railroads as it would be in dealing with a natural or any other artificial person. For my part I do not wish to injure the railroads or do them any wrong, but wish this Government to see that the railroads do not injure the people or do them any wrong. I do not wish to take the rate-making power from the railroad companies. On the contrary, I wish that power left with the public carriers, but when the railroads exercise the rate-making power I wish to see the Government assert a regulative control and supervision over such rates, and to that end a Government tribunal should be maintained to which the shipping public can appeal, and with which complaints of unlawfulness, unreasonableness, and unjustness of railroad charges and practices can be lodged and determined. That tribunal should be an absolutely fair and impartial body, one which will do equal and exact justice to the shipping interests and to the railroad interests; and when such commission has acted, I want the rates established by that body to supersede and have preference over the rate denounced, unless the courts decide that such rates are unconstitutional or illegal. As the rates of the railroads stand and are operated until the Government tribunal has decided otherwise, so I believe that the awards and orders of that commission should stand until its orders are set aside by a judicial tribunal, for I believe that this commission, representing the high purposes and objects of the Government, is more apt to deal out exact justice in these great railroad problems and rate-making propositions than the officials of the railroads, who are prompted largely by self-interest and selfish considerations in their actions. There is nothing radical, revolutionary, or dangerous in such a proposition.

If the railroad corporations can select men competent to establish just and reasonable rates as the law requires, surely this Government can select equally as competent men, who from the very nature and character of the responsibilities placed upon them, biased by no interest, prejudiced by no affiliations, and representing no special interests, will more justly and equitably administer the law. In other words, I think it better to commit the administration of the law to the officials of the Government than to the officials of the corporations. The law now prescribes that rates shall be just and reasonable, but it practically leaves the construction and enforcement of the law in the hands of the railroad officials. What I wish to see is the execution and administration of the law left with the officials of the Government when the railroads fail to observe it.

At the very threshold of this controversy we are met with the argument that the bill is unconstitutional and can therefore have no effect. It is contended with great force, fortified with elaborate research, that Congress has no power or constitutional authority to prescribe and fix a price for or to regulate the charge of transportation by railroads engaged in interstate commerce, and that if it had such power Congress could not delegate the same to a commission as provided in this bill.

If either of these propositions be true, it is evident that the foundation and basic principles upon which this bill is constructed are untenable, and the whole theory upon which Congress is proceeding falls to the ground. I do not think that I go too far should I say that if Congress has no jurisdiction or power to fix rates, or having that power is without authority to confer upon the Commission the right to fix a rate in accordance with the rules and standards it has prescribed, then our Government falls far short of the hope and purposes for which the American people believe it was established, and the sooner this fact is made known the better it will be for the country.

But I can not agree to this proposition. Article I, section 8, paragraph 3 of the Constitution authorizes Congress—

> To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

It is unnecessary to go into a long and elaborate discussion of the causes which led up to the grant of this power by the States to the General Government. Suffice it to say, as is stated by Justice Marshall, that the necessity of granting this power to the Federal Government was the great, if not the main, cause which led up to the establishment of the American Union.

While it is true that the General Government is a government of enumerated powers, yet it is equally true when a power is conferred upon the General Government such power is as full and complete and supreme in the Government as any of the powers which are reserved by the States.

The grant of power to Congress to regulate commerce among the several States, as every other power conferred upon Congress, carries with it an implication of every power special and necessary for its exercise. Judge Cooley says:

The implications from a provision of the Constitution are sometimes exceedingly important, and have large influence upon its construction. In regard to the Constitution of the United States, the rule has been laid down that when a general power is conferred or duty enjoined every particular power necessary for the exercise of the one or the performance of the other is also conferred. The same rule has been applied to State constitutions, with an important modification by the supreme court of Illinois that other powers than those expressly granted may be, and often are, conferred by implication, is too well settled to be doubted.

Under every constitution the doctrine of implication must be resorted to in order to carry out the general grants of power. A constitution can not from its very nature enter into a minute specification of all the minor powers necessary and obviously included it it and flowing from the great and important ones which are expressly granted. It is therefore established as a general rule that when a constitution gives a general power, or enjoins a duty, it also gives, by implication, every particular power necessary for the exercise of the one or the performance of the other. The implication under this rule, however, must be a necessary, not a conjectural or augmentative, one. And it is further modified by another rule, that where the means for the exercise of a granted power are given, no other or different means can be implied as being more effectual or convenient.

There is no more potential factor in the regulation of commerce than the charges which the public carrier fixes for such services. The unequal and discriminatory rates established by the respective States in the regulation of commerce before the adoption of the Constitution was the moving cause for incorporating the present article in that instrument.

Regulation carries with it the power to prescribe the rates and fix the conditions by which commerce is governed. The regulation of commerce must mean the regulation of exchange of commodities among the States, and the terms and conditions of the conveyance of these commodities forming the exchange constitute the method of regulation. When this same subject was up for debate in this body during the discussion of the Cullom bill, that great legislator and jurist of Massachusetts, Senator Hoar, stated:

The regulation of commerce is the regulation of the exchange of commodities. The exchange of commodities is commerce. The regulation of commerce with foreign nations is the regulation of the exchange of commodities with foreign nations. The regulation of commerce among the several States is the regulation of the exchange of commodities among the several States.

An essential part of an exchange is the conveyance of the commodities from the seller to the buyer. Regulation is the prescribing of a rule or law fixing the condition.

To regulate the exchange of commodities is to prescribe the rule, or law, or condition under which such an exchange shall take place.

An essential part of the regulation of commerce, therefore, is the prescribing of the rule, or law, or condition of the conveyance of commodities from seller to buyer. The fixing or regulating of tolls, or charges, or impost for conveying commodities from the seller to the buyer is the prescribing of a condition of that conveyance. It is therefore a regulation of commerce.

Now, whenever the fixing or regulating of such imposts and tolls come within the domain of the law-making power, or whenever such impost or tolls should be regulated by law, the power which regulates commerce should properly regulate them.

This is the settled and unquestioned understanding with reference to foreign commerce. The legislature does not ordinarily regulate rates of freight charged by public carriers for merchandise brought from abroad; not because such regulation would not be a regulation of commerce, but because such carriers are engaged in a business open to unrestricted competition, and it is deemed inexpedient to regulate commerce in that respect.

Before the adoption of the Constitution the power to regulate commerce, and to establish rules and fix rates under which that commerce was carried on, was lodged entirely within the sovereignty of the States, and the jurisdiction thereof was exclusive.

As a means of regulating commerce the States exercised the right of fixing rates and charges and imposing tolls and imposts for conveying these commodities, and it is reasonable to suppose that when this power was ceded to the General Government that it was intended to grant just such powers as the States had enjoyed over the same subject. When, therefore, the States ceded the power of regulating commerce between the States to Congress, they surrendered all the powers which they had over that subject, and delegated all of such powers to the General Government. Surely it can not be contended that in the delegation of power by the States to Congress the framers of the Constitution intended that any of the powers which the States had enjoyed over the subject-matter would be lost to the Federal Government.

When this cession of power was given, it carried with it the exclusive and supreme control over the subject-matter, equally as complete as the States enjoyed, and when the States lost their power over interstate commerce and the regulation of that commerce Congress immediately became vested with the same powers.

Corporations are the creatures of government. They are artificial persons. They have no capacities other than those which the Government gives them. They have no original rights. All of their rights are derivative. Such rights are derived from their charters, subject and subordinate to not only the regulative control of the State, but of the General Government which enjoys equal powers of regulation over the commerce or transportation within its jurisdiction as the States enjoy over the same subject-matter within their jurisdiction. When the operations of these corporations extend beyond the State, the jurisdiction of the State ceases and the powers of Congress begin; then the same power which the State had to regulate the price of transportation or fix the charges for the services rendered within its borders is at once transferred to the Federal Government.

Supreme power lodges in the General Government within the sphere of its constitutional limitations as much as it does in the States. The regulation of commerce is a governmental power and Congress may employ all means not forbidden by the Constitution to accomplish the objects of that power.

The States have exclusive control and power as far as regulating intrastate commerce is concerned, and one of the methods of regulating that commerce is the prescribing and the establishment of rates. So likewise has the Federal Government exclusive power over interstate commerce and the same power which the States have to regulate and control within their jurisdiction, so the Federal Government has a corresponding and equal right to control the railroads and their charges so far as its authority and power extend.

If the States have the authority to establish just and reasonable rates as a means or method of regulating commerce within their borders, it seems to me that it is logical that Congress, vested with full and plenary powers over the same subject-matter as the States enjoy within their territory, has the power likewise to adopt the same method of regulating interstate commerce.

If this be not true, the anomalous position would be presented of the States on the one hand having exclusive control over intrastate or domestic commerce, or fixing and prescribing the rates, schedules, and charges, and, on the other hand, the General Government with exclusive powers over interstate commerce as supreme as that of the State over intrastate commerce, yet without authority to exercise the same powers which the States have of controlling the same.

Chief Justice Marshall, in Gibbons v. Ogden, says:

That the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States and foreign nations is the power to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed; that such power is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution; that "if, as has already been understood, the sovereignty of Congress though limited to specified objects is plenary to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States."

Again, in the same case it is said, that the Federal Government in regulating commerce among the Federal States may use the same means as may also be employed by the States in the execution of its acknowledged powers.

In Kentucky v. The Bridge Company (37 Fed. Rep.) the court said:

What one sovereign (the State) may do in respect to matters within its exclusive control, the other (the United States) may certainly do in respect to matters over which it has exclusive authority.

In 154 U. S., 447, the court said:

Congress has plenary power, subject to the limitations imposed by the Constitution, to prescribe the rule by which commerce among the several States is to be governed, and it may in its discretion employ any appropriate measures not forbidden by the Constitution to carry into effect and accomplish the objects of a power given by the Constitution.

The power given by the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States may employ such means not forbidden by the Constitution to accomplish the object of the powers given to it by that instrument. When Congress, therefore, seeks to regulate commerce by limiting or restricting the railroads in their charges, and prescribing a rate in lieu of that which it has condemned, it is clearly acting within its constitutional powers and in so doing is acting against no prohibitory clause of the Constitution or any article of that instrument.

If Congress has the power to establish rates, has Congress the authority to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the powers enumerated in this measure, and is the conferrance of such powers on the Commission such a delegation of legislative functions as will render the act null and void? Unless Congress has such power and is authorized to delegate it to a tribunal of its creation, it is evident that there can be and will be no effective rate legislation. Congress can not itself go into the rate-making business. The subject is too complex, far reaching, intricate, and complicated, and its details are too minute for Congress to undertake the establishment of any fixed rates by which the railroads shall be governed in their operation. Nor can the common-law principle, which is older than the Constitution itself, that carriers must be just and reasonable in their charges, practicing no discrimination or favoritism, be vindicated through the efforts of the individual who is a victim of these oppressions and wrongs of the roads. The contest is too unequal; the remedies too tortuous and slow to furnish adequate relief. The individual is no match for the corporations in such a struggle, and he would be utterly crushed and destroyed in the contest. The corporations, with their organized forces of attorneys and witnesses, are too powerful against the weak and helpless citizen, though he may be armed with right and justice. To rest the vindication of the reasonableness of charges with the individual citizen will result practically in the placing of no limitations or restrictions upon the roads, and leaving them free to fix unquestioned their charges. In speaking of this proposition, Justice Brewer, in the 52d Federal Reporter, page 912, said:

A reasonable compensation was all they could exact, and he who felt aggrieved by a charge could always invoke the aid of the court to protect himself against it. With him, however, lay the burden of proving the fact that the charge is unreasonable, a burden which all experience shows was onerous and therefore seldom undertaken, the party aggrieved preferring to submit to the overcharge rather than go to the expense and time of contesting it. Hence the effort by the State and Nation to establish limits of charges, and means of evidence of easy and accurate ascertainment.

Objections to Congress conferring this power upon the Commission were urged in the Senate when the Cullom bill was under discussion, and urged with great force and ability. Senator Garland, afterwards Attorney-General of the United States, in discussing this phase of the case, said:

Now, what do we understand by regulating commerce, according to the constitutional provision? It means no more nor less than the power to prescribe the rules by which commerce is governed. The word "regulation" there means the laws of commerce, so far as Congress can prescribe them. This is a legislative power delegated by the Constitution to Congress, and it is one of those powers which are national in their character and the want of which in the old confederation was one of the reasons that necessitated the enlarging the powers of the Union and making it, in respect to this one feature, a nation.

But when Congress, in the exercise of its legislative power delegated to it by the Constitution, may do a thing, where do we find the power in Congress to delegate this authority, delegated to it, to a mere commission of seven, or five, or three, as the case may be? This is not like the case of heads of departments or secretaries who are sometimes empowered by Congress with authority to make rules and regulations to carry into effect certain laws, for there is no law prescribing this bill, as we shall see as we go along, and even in the laws which have heretofore delegated the power I speak of to commissions or to secretaries or to heads of departments, they are generally circumscribed by the power of revision in the President or some higher authority.

If the Senate gets possession of the idea I am working at, it is that the Congress of the United States in this bill—in the very second section of it—is divesting itself of its legislative power as to regulating commerce among the States and putting it in the hands of a commission. It is a fundamental rule, outside of any constitutional question, that a power delegated can not be subdelegated; and it is an unheard of thing that a legislative power can be transferred from a legislative body to any subordinate power.

While it is true that Congress can not delegate its powers to fix rates to any subordinate tribunal of its own creation, and thus transfer its whole authority and jurisdiction over that subject-matter, with unlimited power and discretion on the part of such a tribunal, yet at the same time Congress has the power to fix and establish certain rules and regulations and a standard of charges and commit the execution and application of this general rule to some tribunal it may establish. Section 1 of the bill prescribes that:

All charges made for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property as aforesaid, or in connection therewith, shall be just and reasonable; and every unjust and unreasonable charge for such service, or any part thereof, is prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

The bill prescribes what the rate shall be. It does not leave that question to the discretion of the Commission. It simply imposes on the Commission the duty of applying this general law, and when the Commission in the exercise of this duty fixes a standard of charges it applies the law as Congress has declared.

It is true Congress can not delegate its powers to any tribunal to make a law, or to legislate upon any subject-matter, yet when Congress has made the law and legislated upon that subject-matter it can delegate its powers to some subordinate tribunal to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law intends to make its action depend. The fixing of rates is properly a legislative function, and Congress can not delegate the exercise of that function to a purely administrative body; yet when Congress establishes a standard of rates, and commits the enforcement of that law to a commission, or any other tribunal, it certainly does not delegate all of its powers to such tribunal, or authorize such tribunal to make a law upon the subject-matter confided to it, or to exercise any other discretion than that which the law imposes upon that body, namely, the fixing of a just and reasonable rate, which the law itself prescribes and which the Commission does not originate.

The power to fix a rate is a legislative power, yet when the legislature declares that the rate shall be reasonable or otherwise lays down a general rule for the establishment of rates for the future, the application of such rates becomes a matter of administration, and the power delegated to the Commission to announce the rate is an administrative power. It is, however, contended that the present measure simply prescribes that the rate shall be just and reasonable, which is simply a declaration of the old common-law principle and that such a provision does not prescribe an absolute standard or guide by which the Commission is controlled, and that this standard, if it can be called a standard, is vague, uncertain, and indefinite, and commits to the discretion of the Commission the fixing of the rates or the construction of the law. I admit there is much force in this contention, and should I have any doubt on this subject I shall resolve that doubt in favor of this legislation, which I believe to be for the common good of the country.

But in my judgment the bill is complete in itself. It declares that the rate shall be just and reasonable, and the Commission must obey the law. It can not legally prescribe an unjust or unreasonable rate. What is a just and a reasonable rate has received judicial interpretation, and this standard has a meaning and a definition as clear as any other general principle which the law can announce, and its limitation and application may be regarded as well settled in the law. Instead of Congress entering into an investigation, which of necessity must be inadequate in determining what the rate should be, it has legislated on the subject as far as was reasonably practicable and delegated to the Commission the duty of accomplishing the results prescribed in the statutes.

In the case of the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad v. Dey (35 Fed. Rep., p. 874) we find a case directly in point and so fully covers the points in controversy that I shall make a copious extract from that decision. Dealing directly with the question before us, Mr. Justice Brewer said:

While in a general sense, following the language of the Supreme Court, it must be conceded that the power to fix rates is legislative, yet the line of demarcation between legislative and administrative functions is not always easily discerned. The one runs into the other. The law books are full of statutes unquestionably valid, in which the legislature has been content to simply establish rules and principles, leaving execution and details to other officers. Here it has declared that rates shall be reasonable and just, and committed what is, partially at least, the administration of the law to the railroad commissioners. Suppose, instead of a general declaration that rates should be reasonable and just, it had ordered that the rates should be so fixed as to secure to the carrier above the cost of carriage 3 per cent upon the money invested in the means of transportation, and then committed to the board of railroad commissioners the fixing of a schedule to carry this rule into effect, would not the functions thus vested in such a board be strictly administrative? While, of course, the cases are not exactly parallel, yet the illustration suggests how closely administrative functions press upon legislative power, and enforce the conviction that that which partakes so largely of mere administration should not hastily be declared an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power.

The reasonableness of a rate changes with the changed condition of circumstances. That which would be fair and reasonable to-day, six months or a year hence may be either too high or too low. The legislature convenes only at stated periods—in this State once in two years. Justice will be more likely done if this power of fixing rates is vested in a body of continual session than if left with one meeting only at stated and long intervals. Such a power can change rates at any time, and thus meet the changing conditions of circumstances. While, of course, the argument from inconvenience can not be pushed too far, yet it is certainly a matter of inquiry whether in the increasing complexity of our civilization, our social and business relations, the power of the legislature to give increased extent to administrative functions must not be recognized.

In the recent case of State v. Railroad Commission (37 Northwestern Reports, 782) the supreme court of Minnesota considered this question and sustained a similar enactment. See also the case of State v. Railroad Company (35 Northwestern Reports, 118, and 36 Northwestern Reports, 308) decided by the supreme court of Nebraska. In the case of Tilley v. Savannah Railroad Company (5 Federal Reports, 641) Mr. Justice Wood of the Supreme Court of the United States, sitting on the circuit, also considered the question in a carefully prepared opinion, and sustained a similar enactment. See also other cases cited in the opinion of the supreme court of Minnesota, supra.

The case of Butterfield v. Stranahan, which has been so frequently alluded to in the course of this discussion, appears to me to be conclusive on this point. An act of Congress prohibited the importation of tea inferior in purity and quality to the standard prescribed by a board and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. The act was attacked on the ground that it delegated legislative powers to the Secretary of the Treasury; that Congress had adopted no standard of the purity of the tea, and that it delegated to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury this power. But the Supreme Court upheld the law and declared that—

> Congress legislated on the subject as far as was reasonably practicable and from the necessity of the case was compelled to leave to the executive officials the duty of bringing about the result pointed out by the statute. To deny the power of Congress to delegate such a duty would, in effect, amount to but declaring that the plenary power vested in Congress to regulate foreign commerce could not be efficaciously exerted.

The Supreme Court of the United States has frequently decided that the States have the power, either through constitutional ordinance or legislative act, to delegate this authority to the commissions which the various States have established. When the States sought to confer that power upon those commissions, it was at once earnestly contended that such act on the part of the State government or the legislatures of the States was a delegation of legislative functions to another body in violation of the Constitution. But the supreme courts of the States and the Supreme Court of the United States have repeatedly and uniformly declared that where State legislatures have enacted that rates must be reasonable and just the execution of this law may be constitutionally confided to an administrative body. Such, I understand, is the decision in the case of Stone et al. v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company (116 U. S., 370), in which objection was made to the act of the State of Mississippi on the ground that it conferred both legislative and judicial powers upon its commission.

The same doctrine was announced in the case of Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Co. (154 U. S., 360), in which case Judge Brewer said:

> Passing from the question of jurisdiction to the act itself, there can be no doubt of the general power of the State to regulate the fares and freights which may be charged and received by railroads or other carriers, and that this regulation may be carried on by means of a commission. Such a commission is merely an administrative board created by the State for carrying into effect the will of the State as expressed by its legislature.

These cases affirm the right of State governments to confer such power upon State commissions. It may seem, then, that if the States have this power, Congress, exercising the supreme and exclusive power over interstate traffic, power as conclusive and exclusive as that of the State, would have the same power. But it is claimed that the States derive their power by reason of their sovereignty, and that Congress derives its power over the subject-matter by reason of the commerce clause of the Constitution. However that may be, the power to regulate commerce is a governmental power lodged in Congress by the Constitution, and the method of exercising that power is as full and complete as that enjoyed by the States, and unless there be some limitation, prohibition, or restriction placed upon the Congress its authority would seem to be complete.

Fixing of rates is a method of regulating commerce, for commerce, in its broadest signification, as declared by Chief Justice Marshall, is the right to prescribe the rules which govern commerce. To fix the rates is one of the rules as set down in the case of Ames v. Union Pacific (64 Fed. Rep., 165) wherein Justice Brewer said:

> But within the scope of the word "regulation" as commonly used is embraced the idea of fixing the compensation which the owners of railroad properties shall receive for the use thereof.

In the Maximum Rate case, which has been so repeatedly referred to, Justice Brewer declared, in determining the extent of the power that had been conferred upon the Commission, that—

> There were three obvious and dissimilar courses open for consideration. Congress might itself prescribe the rates, or it might commit to some subordinate tribunal that duty, or it might leave with the companies the right to fix rates, subject to regulations and restrictions, as well as to that rule which is as old as the existence of common carriers, to wit, that rates must be reasonable.

Here it seems that the Supreme Court distinctly stated that the right to confer the rate-making power upon the Commission existed. The language of the court in this decision clearly intimates that the power could be granted by Congress to the Commission, but that it had not been granted in definite terms; that—> the power itself is so vast and comprehensive, so largely affecting the rights of carrier and shipper, as well as indirectly all commercial transactions, the language by which the power is given has been so often used and was so familiar to the legislative mind and is capable of such definite and exact statement, that no just rule of construction would tolerate a grant of such power by mere implication.

The court said that the fact that it was a debatable question was "very persuasive" that Congress had not vested the power in the Commission to fix rates. This very expression, that because it was a debatable question and had been debated was "very persuasive," is a clear suggestion that Congress could within its constitutional powers confer authority upon the Commission to fix rates for the future. In this case the powers of the Commission were the subject-matter of discussion and controversy, and in dealing with the subject it is scarcely to be supposed that the Supreme Court would lightly or loosely use such expressions as we find in this decision.

It is further contended that Congress has no power to endow the Commission with the authority given to it under the bill, for the reason that Article I, Section IX, of the Constitution, declares that—

> No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another.

This article of the Constitution was clearly intended to prohibit the giving of preference by Congress to vessels coming to and departing from the different ports of the country. The convention at that time was dealing with conditions then existing, and it is evident that the purpose was to secure uniformity in port charges of the commerce of the various ports of the country, which had not been the case before the adoption of the Constitution. Under the Confederation there had been great lack of uniformity, and this resulted in the conference at Annapolis in 1786 to consider—

> The trade of the United States, to examine the relative situation in the trade of the States, to consider how far a uniform system in their commercial relations may be necessary to the common interest and their permanent harmony.

From the Annapolis conference came the call for the Philadelphia convention of 1787, which framed the Constitution.

Should this bill become a law, by which the power is conferred upon the Commission to substitute a reasonable rate for any unreasonable rate, it would in no manner come in conflict with this provision of the Constitution. To authorize the Commission to fix a reasonable rate does not necessarily impose upon that body the duty to adopt such regulation of commerce as would give preference to one port over another. The law would be valid and constitutional, and it must be presumed that the Commission in all of its proceedings will act within the limits placed upon it by the Constitution and the law. The act creating the Commission and conferring upon that body the power to do a lawful act certainly would not come under the condemnation of the constitutional provision. If the Commission exceeded its powers and acted beyond the scope of the authority conferred upon it by the law, and by such act brought itself within the prohibitory provision of the Constitution, then such act of the Commission would be declared illegal when questioned. That is, the regulation prescribed by the Commission might be unlawful, not, however, by reason of the power which was conferred upon the Commission, but rather by reason of the Commission exceeding the authority given to it.

If we admit for the sake of argument that Congress has the power to confer upon this Commission authority to fix fair and reasonable rates in lieu of a rate condemned as unreasonable and unjust, such an act would be constitutional, but if the Commission exceeded the powers conferred upon it and substituted an unlawful and confiscatory rate in lieu of the condemned rate, such an act on the part of the Commission would be declared by the courts illegal, not because the law was unconstitutional, but because the Commission had transcended the law. So, likewise, if the Commission should in the regulation of commerce give one port preference over another, which it had no constitutional power to do, this particular act of the Commission would be declared illegal and void. The question of constitutionality, therefore, it seems, would relate rather to the act of the Commission than to the law creating the Commission and giving it constitutional powers.

Admitting, for the sake of argument, that this article of the Constitution could be invoked, it does not occur to me that the exercise of the authority to regulate rates would in any way be controlled or limited by this provision of the Constitution, for it is evident it could be claimed, on the other hand, that the same rate from any given point to all ports would obviously favor the most distant ports, while, on the other hand, to establish uniform mileage rate would in many instances result in the preference of one port over another. This is all the more apparent in view of the fact that numerous ports have from time to time been established in the interior and have thus created a variety of circumstances and conditions not contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. Not only in these instances would the question of distance enter, but it would be necessary in each case to consider what adjustment of the rates would place the different "ports" on a plane of relative equality. Differentials have long been applied without their constitutionality being questioned, those existing between New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore are conspicuous examples of this fact.

It is a fact that railroads do give preferences to one port over another in the adjustment of their rates, and it would be an extraordinary condition that these corporations, the creatures of the law, can do what their creators can not do and which it can not prevent them from doing. If this article of the Constitution can be so construed as to prevent Congress from regulating the charges of the railroads because of incidental preferences which such regulation might give one port over another, and the railroads which are the creatures of the State can give these preferences and Congress can not prevent it, then the argument leads to the conclusion that while Congress is prohibited from giving these preferences, yet the railroads can do what Congress can not do and Congress is helpless to prevent them from so doing. In other words, the railroads can violate the spirit of the Constitution by giving port preferentials, and Congress, because it is prohibited from giving such preferences, can not prevent the railroads from doing it. If all of these contentions be true, then the creature has outgrown the creator. If Congress can not regulate the charges of the railroad in interstate commerce; if it can not establish a general rule for the standard of charges and leave to a commission of its own creation the application of such a rule or standard, and if it can not itself establish the charges or rates which may incidentally give a preference to one port over another, and can not prevent the railroads from giving these port preferentials, then indeed has the servant become the master and the creature of sovereignty become stronger than the sovereign itself.

Mr. President, the so-called "court review" proposition has been much discussed in the consideration of this bill. We have heard much of the "broad review" and the "limited review," and the wide divergence of opinion among Senators on this subject seems to preclude the possibility of reaching a common ground upon which a majority at least can stand.

I do not like the expression "court review." I think the term is misleading, and does not fully convey the idea involved in the controversy. However, I shall use it for the purpose of the present discussion.

Those who advocate the "limited review," as it is called, would confine the rights of the railroads to attack the orders of the Commission fixing a rate only when such a rate operates a confiscation of their property or the taking of the same without just compensation. That is, the railroads can question through the courts the rate-made order of the Commission only in so far as such order impinges their constitutional rights of property as guaranteed under the fifth amendment.

Those who favor the "broad review" contend that the courts should be open to the railroads for the assertion and vindication of whatever rights they may have, whether such rights spring directly from the Constitution or from the law.

I shall try to show further on that this contention amounts almost to a distinction without a difference. Again there are those who believe that the present measure affords all the rights to the railroads which the "broad review" advocates seek, while, on the other hand, there are those who contend that no such power is accorded the roads under this bill, but that the courts are only open to the roads for the assertion of constitutional rights. However this may be, all will agree that such doubt or ambiguity in the measure ought to be removed, and the bill should state specifically its objects and purposes.

It must be remembered that we are making the law, and we can and should make the law free from doubt and question as to its intent and meaning.

No one has ever for a moment contended that Congress has the power to destroy or impair any right guaranteed to a party under the Constitution nor that the Commission in the exercise of its delegated authority can violate any of these rights. Nor can a party enjoying these rights be denied the protection of the courts in asserting them. There may be a difference between the rate which the Commission establishes as a just and reasonable rate and a rate which would afford a just compensation. Should there be such difference found in the Commission-made rate then the courts must be limited in their inquiry to the just compensation accorded under the Constitution and not to the reasonableness and justness of the rate prescribed by the law.

To me there is little or no difference between what we term a legal right and a constitutional right. If the law confers upon any party any special or general right, it seems to me that such right is as sacred and entitled to as much protection through the courts as a right which is derived directly from the Constitution, and the courts ought to be opened for the assertion and protection of that right, as wide in one instance as in the other.

I am not going to discuss any of the refinements of the law on this proposition. I am not going to discuss whether the rate of the Commission is a law-made rate or a Congressional-made rate or not, or whether the Commission is substituted for Congress, and its rate therefore entitled to as much consideration as a rate made by Congress. While this in theory may be correct, yet, as a matter of fact, I know that the Commission may abuse the authority granted to it and may unreasonably exercise the powers confided to it.

The present law prescribes that the rate substituted by the Commission must be a just and reasonable rate, and it strikes me that the railroads are entitled to the full protection of that law. Tremendous power is conferred upon the Commission by this bill, and vast and comprehensive interests affecting the people and the railroads are confided to its administration. The standard of just and reasonable rates established by Congress is in the interest of the people and the roads, and that standard is the guide, and the only guide, which the Commission can follow.

While I have every faith and confidence in the work of that Commission, and while I believe that body, selected with special reference to the peculiar work intrusted to its charge, ought to be, and probably will be, better qualified to carry out and execute the will of Congress than the courts, yet at the same time I can but feel that the power confided to this Commission may be abused or may be unreasonably exercised, and that some check or limitations should be placed upon it.

Mr. President, I am intuitively opposed to conferring upon any body of men, or any board or commission, the absolute and unrestricted right of finally deciding upon the property rights of any individual or any person, legal or natural. I have an idea that courts and courts alone are established for that purpose, and unless there be some overwhelming and paramount reason to the contrary I want to see the final adjudication of all rights left in the hands of the courts. It does not seem to me fair, just, or wise that the tremendous power we are giving to this Commission by which billions of vested rights may be affected, should be placed entirely beyond the power of the courts.

I again repeat my confidence in the Commission; in its work, and in the honesty of its purpose. I admit that the question committed to it is largely a business question presenting factors in its settlement which are not of a judicial character; that the fixing of rates addresses itself to the legislative or administrative mind rather than the judicial mind, and the Commission may act upon such facts as could not be properly brought before the courts as proof or evidence. Yet, at the same time, we are bound to admit that the orders fixing the rates affect directly property rights and property interests, and the Commission in the exercise of its complex and difficult duties may honestly, but grieviously, err, or even abuse the powers delegated to it.

Mr. President, I believe that the railroads are entitled to the full protection of the law, and when the law declares that rates shall be just and reasonable they are entitled to all the benefits of the law; and if the Commission, or any other tribunal charged with the duty of executing and administering the same, violates its provisions, then I believe a remedy ought to be left to the injured party to seek redress through the courts. I do not mean by this to confer any rate-making power upon the courts, nor do I wish to confer any rights upon the roads other than those the law gives them. But whatever rights they may have, I want the courts open for a judicial determination of the same.

Mr. President, the records of Congress will show that every bill bearing upon this subject up to this one has contained some provision authorizing a judicial investigation or review of the orders of the Commission in some shape or form, and, if I am not mistaken, the only one that limited the review of the question of confiscatory rates was the one introduced by the distinguished senior Senator from Texas. In addition to this, Mr. President, the State laws creating and establishing State railroad commissions contain similar provisions for review on the part of the courts. This is what I understood the President of the United States to advocate when he used the following language:

> While I am of the opinion that it would be undesirable, if it were not impracticable, primarily to clothe the Commission with general authority to fix railroad rates, I do believe that, as a fair security to the shippers, the Commission should be vested with the power, when a given rate has been challenged and after full hearing found to be unreasonable, to decide, subject to judicial review, what shall be a reasonable rate to take its place, the ruling of the Commission to take effect immediately and to obtain until reversed by a court of review.

The distinguished chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in an address reprinted in the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science for November, 1905, upon the same subject stated:

> When the Commission has investigated and decided, when it has promulgated such an order as it may be authorized to make, its duty in the premises should be fully discharged and ended. Subject to such judicial review as will protect against the abuse or unreasonable exercise of delegated authority, the lawful determinations of the regulating tribunal, unless restrained or set aside by the courts, should take effect and be obligatory substantially the same as legislative enactment.

I stated, Mr. President, that the distinction between the advocates of the "broad" and the "limited" review was, in my opinion, a distinction almost without a difference.

The cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States on this subject have arisen in the States, involving a construction of the fourteenth amendment, which declares that no one shall be deprived "of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," but, in my judgment, an entirely different question will be presented when the constitutional rights of the roads will be submitted for judicial determination under this bill. Their rights will not be determined by the fourteenth, but by the fifth amendment, which not only declares that no person shall be "deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," but further provides "nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

The Supreme Court in the decision of the Nebraska Freight Rate case, involving the discussion of a just and reasonable rate, quoted with approval the language used in the Turnpike case (164 U. S.), which reads as follows:

> The utmost that any corporation operating a public highway can rightfully demand at the hands of the legislature, when exercising its general powers, is that it receive what, under all the circumstances, is such compensation for the use of its property as will be just both to it and the public.

I believe, as a practical question, when the railroads complain of the orders of the Commission on the ground that such orders violate the guarantees of property under the fifth amendment, the courts will hold that just and reasonable rates is the equivalent of a just compensation, and that just compensation will entitle the roads to just and reasonable rates.

As the Supreme Court in the cases appealed from the States upon questions involving the violation of the fourteenth amendment has necessarily been compelled to investigate all the facts bearing upon that particular question in order to reach a judicial determination of the issue, so, when the railroads invoke the protection of the fifth amendment, the court, extending its inquiry to the question of just compensation, must necessarily investigate all of the facts, and its decision will harmonize as far as possible the constitutional guarantee and the provisions of the act of Congress.

Mr. President, while I am willing that the order of the Commission substituting another rate for a rate condemned may be the subject of judicial determination, yet I am unwilling, if it can possibly be prevented, to have such order of the Commission suspended by temporary injunction.

Force and effect ought to be given to such order, and the same should remain in operation and effect. It must be remembered that in granting temporary restraint by interlocutory injunction courts of equity in no manner anticipate the ultimate determination of the rights involved. They merely recognize that a sufficient case has been made out to warrant the preservation of the property or right in issue in statu quo until a hearing on the merits can be had, without expressing or without having the means of forming a final opinion of such rights.

I am opposed to the use of this writ in anticipation of the ultimate determination of the issues involved in the case, because I believe its use will be resorted to in every instance where the roads are dissatisfied with the decision of the Commission, and thus the work of that body will be practically annulled.

Conceding the power of Congress to pass this regulation, the inquiry naturally follows, Is such a policy on the part of the Government a wise, just, and safe course to pursue? I believe, Mr. President, that I realize fully the gravity and importance of this legislation, and the more I study and reflect upon the enormous powers we are confiding to this Commission, the magnitude of the vital issues involved in this delegation of power, and the consequences which may flow from its exercise, the more I feel the responsibility of my duties. The laws now upon the statutes, it is claimed by many, provide against the unreasonable rates, against unjust discriminations, rebates, favoritism, and other malpractices. That may be true; yet, Mr. President, it is equally true that there are no efficient and adequate remedies, and the object of this measure is to provide a safe, certain, and conservative remedy. Let us, therefore, examine into some of the principal changes which this bill makes in the present law and what additional powers it confers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission; second, if the railroad management, and the part that such management plays in the business activities and the industrial and economic conditions and development of the country, demand or warrant such a measure.

The bill under consideration is built and constructed on what is known as the Cullom Act of 1887. This proposed measure is intended to add to and strengthen that law without in any manner affecting its substantive provisions or in changing any of its fundamental principles. It makes the present law more comprehensive, bringing under its provisions refrigerating and elevating charges, private-car lines and terminal facilities, and extending to the Commission jurisdiction thereof. The proposed bill also prescribes the manner in which railroad accounts shall be kept, the particular accounts to be kept, and that they shall be open at all times to the inspection or examination of the Commission or its authorized agents. With these additions to the law the fundamental or organic principles of the present law are practically unchanged, except as to the right or the power given to the Commission, after due hearing and investigation, to substitute a rate or charge for an unreasonable rate or charge by it condemned. The line of demarcation between the old law and the present bill is clear and well defined. Under the old law complaints were heard, findings and orders were issued after investigation, and unreasonable rates were denounced, but the Commission of itself was without power or authority to give effect to its orders, and the law failed to do so. These powers of the Commission have been repeatedly recognized by the highest judicial tribunal of the land, and no one doubts the constitutionality of the act. The present bill differs in so far as the powers of the Commission are concerned only in this particular: It authorizes the Commission after investigating a challenged rate and after denouncing that rate as unreasonable, to prescribe what will be a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative rate, to be thereafter observed as a maximum rate to be charged; and when said rate is so fixed the law provides that such order of the Commission shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier and that it shall remain in effect unless suspended or modified by the Commission, or suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

I have thus analytically defined the changes which this bill proposes to make in the present law. Ought these changes to be made? Every fair-minded man concedes that the law ought to be amended so as to bring within the jurisdiction of the Commission and the regulative power of that body the private-car system, elevating and refrigerating charges and terminal lines and private sidings, and supervision over the bookmaking of these corporations; but all the weight of the opposition is leveled against the power conferred upon the Commission by the fifteenth section of this bill.

A government such as ours, reaching out and ramifying in so vast a domain of activities, must necessarily carry on many of its functions by and through subordinate tribunals. In fact, all the agencies of government act within the sphere of their constitutional or legislative limitation. In the division of the powers of government, many of the most important functions are committed either to constitutional or legislative tribunals or instrumentalities. The district and circuit courts, with all of their great and far-reaching powers, are the creatures of the legislative will. The Postal Department of the Government, with its vast and multiplying duties, is established by the legislative department of the Government. The administration and execution of the tariff laws are confided largely to a board of appraisers, while all of the immense public domain of the country is committed to the administration of one of the Departments of the Government. While these instances might be multiplied, I mention them simply to show that the most important functions of the Government touching the rights of persons and property have been confided to agencies provided and created by Congress. But while it is true that the duties and powers conferred upon this Commission are far-reaching and of vast importance, yet I am unwilling to admit that this Government, which in the past has dealt satisfactorily with some of the greatest and most intricate problems that ever confronted a nation, is incompetent or unable to solve this great question honestly, intelligently, and for the best interests of all. And while I am willing to admit that tremendous power is lodged in the Commission by the bill, yet that same power is to-day exercised by the railroad corporations, and while there may be some danger of its abuse by the Commission, yet I submit there is a greater danger of its abuse by the officials and employees of these corporations.

Addressing myself to the second proposition, as to whether the industrial conditions of the country justify and require such legislation, I will say that it is my judgment that we have reached the epoch in the history of the industrial and economic development of this country, in which the railroads have played and are still playing such a prominent if not dominating part, that such legislation is absolutely necessary.

The last official reports show that there were 214,478 miles of trackage in this country, not including second or third tracks and sidings, and that the carriers' earnings for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, amounted to the enormous sum of $2,073,177,325. These figures show that about one-tenth of the entire wealth of the country, with its more than eighty millions of people, is owned and controlled by the railroads; that their annual income exceeds by threefold the entire revenue of the Federal Government from all sources; that their army of employees, amounting to 1,300,000, is greater than any army that ever went into the field. This immense wealth is rapidly consolidating into one vast, compact, and irresistible power. The various steps by which this consolidation has been so rapidly crystallizing is generally known and recognized. According to Moody's Truth about the Trusts, published in 1904, the first group, with details of lines embraced, the mileage and capitalization included, is the Vanderbilt or New York Central group, with 21,880 miles of lines and an aggregate capitalization of $1,169,196,132, and controlling 132 subcompanies or subsidiary corporations; second, the Pennsylvania Railroad group, covering 19,300 miles, with $1,822,402,235 of capital and controlling 289 subcompanies or subsidiary corporations; third, the Morgan group, with 47,206 miles of lines and $2,265,116,350 of capital, and controlling 225 subcompanies or subsidiary corporations; fourth, the Gould-Rockefeller group, with 28,157 miles of lines and $1,368,877,540 of capital; fifth, the Harriman-Kuhn-Loeb group, with 22,943 miles of lines and $1,321,243,711 of capital, containing 85 subsidiary companies, and, sixth, the Moore or Rock Island group, with 25,092 miles of lines and $1,070,250,939 of capital, operating 91 subcompanies.

These six groups, with $9,017,016,907 of capital, control 165,586 miles of the total railroad mileage of the United States. The boards of transportation directing these six groups have already practically parceled out the whole territory of the country among themselves, and establish and fix the rate of transportation as any one of the respective boards of managers may see fit to dictate, or else the whole tariff or charges may be regulated as if by one general board. The passion for consolidation and centralization, like every other governing influence, feeds upon its own appetite. Already the railroads of the country are classified in the official returns of the Government as "operating roads" and "subsidiary roads," or those lines that operate by sufferance of the larger systems and derive their incomes from rentals or kindred sources.

It would be unnatural if the conditions were other, and the men who dominate these systems would be more than human if they failed to seek all the wealth and power that they can possibly acquire. It is the old struggle that has been made throughout the ages, since the first man oppressed his brother—a passion that in a modified form is typified in the Old World institutions to-day, and against which these United States were intended as a protest. Events within the past few years have shown us more clearly than ever before that this Government, modeled with the primary view of securing individual freedom, must stand between the citizen on the one hand and these vast interests of consolidated wealth that dominate our individual life on the other, and that no other power than that of the Government can reach the abuses from which the people are asking for relief.

The tremendous mileage of our great railways is now dominated, owned, or operated by half a dozen systems, and these great lines are interwoven by community of interest until competition has practically disappeared and disappeared forever. I say disappeared forever, for it is idle to expect, futile to endeavor, and perhaps senseless to desire a return to the old system of small competing lines. These new conditions bring new problems, but the advantages to be derived and that are apparent in the operation of the wholesale method of transportation should not cause us to lose sight of the insidious tendencies to monopoly and oppression.

One of the great dangers to the public incident to these gigantic combinations is that the absorption and assimilation of new lines is almost universally attended by reckless inflation of capitalization or bonded indebtedness. I know that it is contended that this is a matter of no possible interest to the public; that corporations are private affairs which the owners may operate as they please; that with reasonable rates it can be of no concern to the public or to the Government whether the stock of the road is $100,000,000 or $600,000,000. Yet, when subjected to a final analysis, it will readily be perceived that the inevitable result of this overcapitalization is increased taxation in the way of additional freight charges.

Take the case of the Northern Securities Company, which attempted to create a monopoly of all the northwestern transcontinental lines of the country. In the course of his argument before the Supreme Court, which resulted in the frustration of that gigantic project, the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, then the Attorney-General of the United States, whose able and conspicuous services in the performance of his high duties entitle him to the gratitude of the country, in speaking of this method of financial manipulation, said:

Of this common stock, as early as February, 1897, Mr. Hill and Lord Mount Stephens had acquired 258,341 shares at $16 per share, or $25,834,000 of par value for $4,133,456. Some idea of the commercial value of the monopoly of transportation to the participants may be had when it is considered that this stock, which cost $16 per share in 1897, was put into the Securities Company in 1901 at $115 per share, netting the owners $25,000,000.

But the most striking example of this class of high finance that has come to light was developed and referred to by Commissioner Clements in his testimony before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate last summer, when he said:

> But I have a little matter that I want to call to your attention, which was disclosed in the proceedings two or three years ago. The railroad commission of Kentucky presented a complaint before the Commission which called for an investigation of the acquisition of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad by Mr. Gates. That came out, at least, in the investigation. It appears that Mr. Gates, a very active man, had gotten hold of a majority of the stock of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, which had previously been held and controlled by the Belmonts in the interest of others whom they represented, and it disturbed some gentlemen in New York very much to think that Mr. Gates should be turned loose as a railroad man in the South, running the Louisville and Nashville road. The testimony shows that Mr. Gates had begun to buy this stock of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad at about 110, and he paid as high as 130. It was said that he paid on an average of about 125 for it. It was running along at about 110 before he commenced.
> When it was ascertained that he had a majority of the stock, Mr. Morgan was able to get Mr. Schwab to go, at 1 or 2 o'clock at night, to his hotel and wake him up to know upon what terms he could get an option upon that or buy it, and they found Mr. Gates and got him to give an option, by which he agreed to take 150 for all majority of the stock. They took the option and handled it, and Mr. Morgan called up the president of the Atlantic Coast Line and suggested the situation to him, and the outcome was that the Atlantic Coast Line agreed to take it at 150, and to do so issued $35,000,000 in new bonds, $8,500,000 in new stock, to the former stockholders—to the then stockholders—and $5,000,000 of stock further. That resulted in an increase of the bonds and stocks of the Atlantic Coast Line, and that increase of about $50,000,000 in order to enable the Atlantic Coast Line to take the control of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad out of the hands of Mr. Gates. Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan expressed it in this way in his testimony:
> "I don't wish to impugn any man's ability, but I did not consider Mr. Gates a proper person to manage the Louisville and Nashville Railroad."
> Mr. Gates was perhaps an active man, and he might indulge in what would be called among the railroad brethren "unreasonable and rough competition." I suppose that is what it meant. He was not wanted in that family of railroad men. And therefore the net outcome was that the Atlantic Coast Line was saddled with about $50,000,000 more of capitalization in order to get Mr. Gates out of the way. The property did not have another nail driven in it, or another cross-tie, or any more rolling stock, or any stock of any sort in addition, but when you talk about the railroad rates of the Atlantic Coast Line, and the increase of 2 cents on lumber which the Atlantic Coast Line made, along with others, the Commission, or Congress, or the country want to consider that $50,000,000 of capitalization, as well as that part of the capitalization of these railroads in the hands of the widows and the orphans who have put their little savings into these securities. And when you consider these $50,000,000 worth of bonds, of capitalization, you want to consider that the bonds become a fixed charge. Interest on them must be paid.

Now, imagine an unreasonable rate being attacked on the ground of any of these instances of stock watering and inflation of values and a reduction being ordered. Is there any doubt the first defense would be that the Commission rates were confiscatory, and not furnishing a fair return on the capitalization, bona fide and watered, besides interest on its bonded debt?

But, Mr. President, there is a far greater danger in these concentrations than the mere monopoly of the American transportation system. The great producing agencies of this country are rapidly consolidating into corporate monopolies, the success of which is to a greater or less extent dependent upon the distributing systems of the country. In the formation of these gigantic industrial enterprises the movement of their products is a factor of such overshadowing importance that transportation is the first feature considered. Thus the captains of industry and the railroad magnates are not long in striking hands or arriving at a community of interest, the one participating in the holdings of the other, and each being represented on the directorates of the other. Rate manipulations naturally follow, their purpose being to wipe out competition. They are the most efficacious remedy known for dealing with troublesome rivals, and their application is swift and certain. But, in the very nature of the case, it is only a question of time in the evolution of the system, after third parties in the form of small and independent shippers have been eliminated and all competition has been destroyed, when a union between the producing corporations and transportation systems of the country will follow.

Already the anthracite coal mines are cornered and the bituminous fields are going the same way; oil is tied up in almost every State, while the amalgamation of iron beds and copper mines is merrily going on.

Consolidations have followed consolidations until the whole power of the enormous distributing instrumentalities is absorbed by a few boards controlled and dominated by a few men. Is it safe, Mr. President, for this Government, dedicated by the fathers to the equal protection of all, to permit this vast power, imposing annually by way of transportation tariffs over $2,000,000,000 of burden upon the body of the people, to remain in the hands of these boards, without limitation, control, or restriction? I think not. The power is too vast, the temptations to abuse too great, and the abuse too certain.

Mr. President,

> "It is excellent
> To have a giant's strength; but it is tyrannous
> To use it like a giant."

Without entering into an analysis of that well-worn statement, the question still arises, Does anything with a giant's power use it other than as a giant? Would a giant's power ever develop but by the use that makes it a giant's power? Inconceivable is the theory that the power of all the great railroad interests in the United States, concentrated in six or seven systems, shall be used other than as a giant would use it, or that it would have been possible for that power to have been so concentrated if the tyranny implied by a giant's strength had not been applied to it? Aside and apart from the question of preferential rates, extortionate tolls, rebates, discriminations and maladministration, and leaving these as though they were subjects still unsuggested, it is inconceivable that such a power so concentrated can be other than a menace to the security and tranquillity of the great business interests of the country. It is well said that no house is big enough for two masters, and certainly no government is big enough for two rulers, and that is what our government permits when it elects the legislative branch and coincidentally submits the great subject of transportation to a separate power.

The control of the means of transportation and the possession of the routes of trade will continue to be what they have been since the dawn of civilization—the gates of commerce and the doors of wealth. When these doors and gates are swung and closed on the hinges of personal gain and private advancement the public interests must and will be subordinated to private aggrandizement.

The wealth and power of the railroads are almost as vast as the territory they cover. This enormous power, through combinations and affiliations, is controlled by a body of men smaller than would be considered efficient to manage one single department of the Government. The advancement and development of the industrial and economic life of the nation is intrusted to these boards, self-appointed, responsible to no one, and with no spring of action but that of private gain. This Government is founded upon the principle that power shall not be confided in too few hands. The fathers of our country revolted from a despotism that had grown oppressive; the red blood of heroes was shed that the public and not the private good should be the object of effort, and to-day the wisdom and reward of this effort is demonstrated in the distribution of power in our Government. These railroad directors are men of passions and weaknesses like the rest of humanity. Start they may with the assumption that they are appointed to benefit mankind, and that they are intrusted with the charge to lead their nation to the pinnacle of power, but they would be more than human if their all but omniscient power should not be diverted occasionally to a baser object and a tyrannous use.

I have no wish or inclination to blame or unduly criticise these railroad directors. For their success and marvelous achievements many of them deserve praise, yet it must be admitted that they are moved by the same passions and desires that influence other men, and in my opinion no coterie of men in the United States or any other country actuated by private interests is unselfish and strong enough to be intrusted with such practically unlimited power over the fortunes and destinies of their fellow-men. Power does not by any means confer upon human beings a proportionate consecration in its use, and it is not in our present state of civilization a safe proposition to permit any man, or any number of men, to control and use without restraint such power as these boards now enjoy. It could not be done safely in our Government, nor can it be intrusted to that "imperium in imperio" which has sprung up in this country and in which the inner power has grown to such proportions that the circumscribing power of the Government is weakened. I have not said, nor shall I say, that the railroad corporations have any malign object in centralizing, concentrating, and exploiting their influence. I do not believe they have. I am convinced that they have no object more sinister than the accumulation of vast wealth, but in the expression of that desire they have, it can not be denied, exercised a tyranny in this country at times that has been almost ferocious. That any power grown to such proportions, with such unlimited field of action, with such titantic strength, with such momentum as it has gained through the passing years of prosperity, should be permitted to exist, unrestrained and uncontrolled, is opposed to the very genius of our institutions. Where a government works in fetters, or must stand aside, for the exercise of a power that it can neither limit nor control, such a government must necessarily grow weaker and weaker as the power which it fails to control grows stronger and stronger. In the rule of quasi-public institutions the railroads have called forth, it is true, the activity which has stimulated individual exertions and national development, but in their far more influential character, as an aggregation of capital, labor, and brains for the purpose of gaining wealth, they have substituted their own activity for that of individuals and governments.

That evils formidable to human freedom and individual effort are the natural effect of the concentration of such power in a few hands must become a conviction with anyone who understands the frailty of man or who has read the history of nations. We are told that the rights of property are sacred. So they are. The right of the small shipper is as sacred as that of the greatest trust or the most inflated corporation. We do not want to be deceived by bulk, by bigness, by overtowering immensity. The sacred right of property, this divinity of wealth which we all worship, is as inherent in the dollar of the poor as in the millions of the rich or the billions of the corporations. If it has the disadvantage of traveling singly rather than in flocks, of being pitted alone against its enemies instead of fighting with the herd, it becomes us all the more to offer it the protection of a government that has for its religion the equality of the rights of all men. It is not easy to define property, not easier than to tell what abstract justice and equity and right are. Where one man's rights are infringed by the activities of another must always be a line vague and varying, but it would seem reasonably obvious that the concentration of the commerce of the country into six or seven systems, with powers to make and unmake fortunes, to create and destroy industry, to fix the price of necessaries of life, and withal to be responsible not even to the Government of the country, is a contradiction of the Constitution.

It has been given to but a few inspired individuals to use power with moderation and altruism. There is something in the composition of man that is born of woman that makes power a firebrand in his hand. Evil as are the effects of great wealth on some natures, its tangibility and computability act generally as constraints or exercise a moderating effect on its use. Not so with power. The temptation to use it is constant. The amusement of testing and watching its effect becomes a passion. The desire to exercise it, the impatience of its limitations, becomes a frenzy. Its subtlety, its complexity, its mutability are the spurs which stimulate it. It grows by what it feeds upon, and its appetite knows no bounds or restraint. Each effect it produces acts as a link in an infinite series of possibilities. Begun as a controllable influence, it ends by taking possession of every faculty of its possessor.

Here is where lurks the danger in this centralized power. It will wax in strength and increase as the years go by, for surrendering nothing, jealously guarding each new power as acquired, powerful to resent interference, and hasty to visit condign punishment on all who seek to curb or control it, it will soon become a menace to the free and untrammeled operation of the Government itself, and, in the language of President Garfield—> the State legislatures of the Union, in creating these vast corporations, have evoked a power greater than the legislatures themselves.

Mr. President, the people know that national and State bounties went into the building of the roads; they know that the wealth of the country has contributed to the success of the railroads, as the railroads have aided in the development of the wealth of the country; they know the railroads, having grown to power, feel safe in whatever wrong or injustice they may practice, and they feel and they know that there is no relief from the extortionate demands and unjust impositions of these roads other than that which the Government will afford. They know that to a certain extent these corporations are governmental agencies exercising in part governmental functions, and to that extent are subject to governmental control, and they appeal to this Congress to so control and regulate them that the tariffs and schedules of charges which they may establish shall be subject to governmental revision. They are asking no further protection of this Republic than the monarchies of the Old World extend to their subjects.

No civilized government in the world permits this class of corporations, engaged in a public service and to that extent public servants, the unrestricted right to fix and establish the rates which the people shall pay before they can move their produce. In England, France, Germany, Austria, Russia, and, in fact, all over Europe the government either owns these public utilities or through some boards, tribunals, or other agencies control and regulate the carriers in their transportation charges.

And while it has been contended that Government control of the public carriers in the continental countries has resulted in a higher rate of charges, yet I have such an abiding faith in our institutions and in the strength and fairness of our Government that I am led to believe the governmental control of these vast corporate agencies will in the end lead to the greatest good to the greatest number.

GAMBLING IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. BURNHAM. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 10853) to prohibit gambling in the Territories, which is on the Calendar under Rule IX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was about to move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest that we have an executive session.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator will withhold that motion until the bill the Senator from New Hampshire has asked consideration of may at least be read and placed before the Senate. It will be impossible to dispose of it this evening, but it will give notice to Senators that the bill is under consideration and that at an early day it will be voted upon. It is a bill which is directly connected with the question of statehood. It proposes to prohibit gambling in the Territories by much severer penalties than any heretofore imposed. If we could take it up and proceed with it until the bill has been read, it might then go over.

Mr. LODGE. The bill has been read.

Mr. BURNHAM. I would be glad to have the bill taken up to-morrow.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was going to suggest——

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the bill had better go over until to-morrow.

Mr. FORAKER. If the bill has been read, as I have just been informed it has been——

Mr. LODGE. It has been read.

Mr. ALDRICH. I insist on my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been read.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire who has the bill in charge to the fact that we will want to discuss this measure somewhat, and that I will want to have a time fixed for voting on it, so that Senators can be here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Perhaps it might be understood——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. ALDRICH. For the purpose of making an inquiry.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish merely to make a suggestion to the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from New Hampshire. Perhaps we might be able to take up the bill to-morrow after the morning business. I understand that there is no speech to be made on either side upon the rate bill to-morrow.

Mr. FORAKER. I think it would be well for us to have an understanding that we will press the bill from time to time as opportunity is afforded.

Mr. LODGE. It will be impossible to displace the rate bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Oh, of course; but with the rate bill temporarily laid aside, if no Senator wishes to speak on it, I see no reason why we should not proceed with this measure to-morrow. I presume that is agreeable to the Senator from Ohio.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 18, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 17, 1906.

[Legislative day of April 16.]

The recess having expired at 11.30 a. m., the House was called to order by the Speaker.

NATIONAL QUARANTINE BILL.

The SPEAKER. On the pending bill the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DAVEY] is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I raise the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. BEALL of Texas (during the count). Mr. Speaker, may I inquire whether or not the count has determined that a quorum is present?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is trying to determine the presence or absence of a quorum. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-seven Members are present—a quorum. [Applause.] The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DAVEY] is recognized.

Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire but a moment to say to the House that the bill now before it for consideration is the bill S. 4250. The committee reports striking out all after the enacting clause and substituting the bill H. R. 14316, which is exactly the same bill that was considered by this House and passed on April 3, just two weeks ago to-day. Mr. Speaker, I now reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana reserves the remainder of his time. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] is recognized.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, this is but an effort on the part of those who had the management of this House bill to untangle it from an unfortunate parliamentary situation in which they placed it by reason of the precipitate haste with which they forced the consideration of the House bill on the 3d day of the present month. The Senate the day before had passed this bill which we now have up for consideration and was then on the Speaker's desk, and the gentlemen then could have as well offered the House bill in place of the Senate bill, as they do now. In that event the House would have been permitted to express its preference between the two bills, which they were not permitted to do, but which those who opposed the House bill with the objectionable seventh section desired to do.

It is not necessary to repeat here the reasons for the situation with which the House was confronted and which prevented the due consideration of the questions involved in this bill. I want to state very briefly that so far as the Senate bill was concerned, while I have some inherent and fundamental objections to the Federal Government assuming exclusive control over the matters of quarantine, yet yielding to the pressure that is behind the passage of a quarantine bill such as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] drew, and which bill would not have met with serious objection at my hands, at least, I want to say that I am content to have the Senate bill that is now on the Speaker's table passed. But I am not content, and I will undertake to repeat the reason why I am not content, to have the bill which the majority of the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce drafted in place of the one which it was understood was the concurrent judgment and desire of those from the section of the country which in the past year has been visited by yellow fever substituted for the bill introduced by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and by the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY], and passed in place of that bill, as the consensus of the opinion of the gentlemen who met for the purpose of securing quarantine legislation. However much I may subject myself to criticism, as I did the other day at the hands of the distinguished chairman of this committee and of other Members of this House, or those who may not be Members of the House, I do not believe Congress has the power to pass it, and I am content to take my humble place alongside of those who were likewise criticised by the gentleman from Iowa in his speech on the 3d, when he said this:

> In the earlier days when it was proposed to do something in a national way for the betterment of the people the early patriots of the Democratic persuasion always threw up their hands, as does the gentleman from Georgia to-day, and said, "Ah, this is unconstitutional."

As I say, I am ready and willing to take my place, and feel complimented that I should be so placed by the gentleman from Iowa, along with the earlier patriots of the Democratic party who resisted the invasion by the Federal Government of the powers of the State to control and regulate their own police affairs. [Applause.]

I do not desire to consume the time this morning except to repeat and state here the language of the Supreme Court in one of the adjudicated cases, as follows:

> The power of the State to impose restraints and burdens upon persons and property in the conservation of the public health, good order, and prosperity is a power originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to the General Government, nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States, and essentially exclusive. It is not to be doubted that the power to make the ordinary regulations of police remains with the individual States, and can not be assumed by the National Government.

Mr. Speaker, I do not care to burden the House or to delay the consideration of this bill by further reference to cases. I have undertaken on previous days to state my views before the House on the law, as I understood the law, as I understood the doctrine which I am proud to advocate upon the floor of this House. I state here, in conclusion, my conviction that this House, this Congress, can not legitimately or lawfully pass a law containing a provision which would prevent a State from stopping at its borders and prevent entering therein any person or vessel or train containing persons infected with disease or that have been exposed to disease. By that doctrine I stand to-day, and by that doctrine I propose to stand, and I am content to leave it to the great tribunal of the country—the Supreme Court of the United States—which, in my judgment, will finally uphold that doctrine so safe, so sound, so American, so democratic that it has been embodied in the fundamental law of the land, that it is reserved to the States, and that you can not take it away from them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL].

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, this bill has afforded the Speaker of this House an opportunity to manifest his increasing love and admiration for the Senate by following one of its precedents in regard to what constitutes a quorum. I very much fear that this action will be seized upon in the future by a mean and narrow partisanship to serve some base purpose.

It seems the irony of fate that, to pass this one bill, gentlemen from this side of the House have been compelled twice to contradict their professions of a lifetime and twice to abandon the traditions of their section and their party.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I deny that there is any necessity to vest the Federal Government with any additional authority with respect to quarantine matters. If the purpose is to utilize the great resources of the Government in preventing the introduction of yellow fever into this country or in combating it when it has gained a foothold here, I insist that further legislation is wholly unnecessary.

Every agency and power of the Government can be invoked at the present time and under the present laws. Around the entire border of the United States—upon the coasts of Gulf and oceans, upon the Canadian and Mexican borders, everywhere—the Government now has its agents and inspectors guarding against the introduction of infectious disease. Not a train can come across our border, not a ship can empty its passengers or its cargo of freight without the consent of the Federal officials. In addition to this the States have all their machinery in operation to subserve the same purpose. Before yellow fever can enter our country to-day to blight our cities, paralyze our commerce, and destroy our people it must elude the vigilance of both the national and State authorities. But under this bill it is proposed to deny to the States the right to protect themselves in this way. Upon what theory can this be justified? Will anyone say that the peril will be lessened by lessening the precautions against peril? Is a country safer from the invasion of hostile fleets or armies with but one line of forts protecting its borders than it would be with two? Is an army safer with the protection of only one line of pickets than it would be with two? Are the lives of our people better guarded with only the Federal Government warding off disease than they would be with both the Federal and the State governments uniting for their protection? Gentlemen must adopt this strange line of argument before they can support this bill.

Is the purpose of this bill to have the Federal Government employ its energies to suppress disease after it has gained a foothold here? Further legislation is not necessary for this purpose, because the General Government, under existing laws, can utilize all its resources to attain this end in harmony with and in cooperation with the States. This has been done repeatedly in Texas and elsewhere. A few years ago there occurred an outbreak of yellow fever at Laredo and again at San Antonio. Last year almost the whole of Louisiana was scourged. In these instances, and in many others, the States and the Federal Government labored together in harmonious and friendly rivalry to stamp out the pestilence. Each was a help, an encouragement, and a check upon the other. Why should it be otherwise? If a city is staggering under an epidemic of disease, all its energies and resources should be devoted to an effort to check its inroads and to destroy it. The State should cooperate with the city, but it should not deny to the city the right to protect itself. In like manner, when pestilence enters a State the Federal Government should cooperate with the State, but it should not assume to itself exclusive authority and paralyze and destroy the power of the State to protect itself.

But, Mr. Speaker, if it is insisted that it is necessary to have additional legislation, why not accept the bill that has passed the Senate without such radical amendment? That great body has said by its action that the provisions of its bill are sufficient. That bill has also received the approval of the people most interested. A few months ago a conference was held at Chattanooga, participated in by representative men of almost every Southern State. This conference, after due deliberation, recommended certain legislation, and the Senate bill was introduced and passed as a substantial compliance with such recommendations. In addition to the indorsement of this conference, the Senate bill received the approval of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] who introduced a like bill in this House. In addition to all this, the Senate bill was indorsed at a conference of the representatives of almost every State that is subject to epidemics of yellow fever. The Senate bill thus comes to us not only with the indorsement of the Senate, but with the approval of all those most interested in protecting this country against yellow-fever scourges.

Not only this, but the Chattanooga conference refused to indorse the very character of proposition that is now sought to be forced upon the people of the South, and the conference of southern representatives refused to indorse it, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] refused to incorporate it in the bill introduced by him.

We now witness the spectacle of gentlemen who participated in the Chattanooga conference and in the conference of southern representatives here clamoring for the very provision they refused to accept, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] now appears as the special champion of the very provision that he repudiated time after time.

How can gentlemen explain or justify such inconsistency? Although we have existed for about one hundred and seventeen years without the Federal Government usurping this one right of the State to control matters pertaining to the health of its people, gentlemen now seem suddenly frightened lest chaos may ensue if the States do not at once surrender this power.

With section 7 of this substitute bill eliminated, I dare say that there would not be a vote in this House against it, yet gentlemen are thrown into a paroxysm of anguish at the suggestion of striking out a section that nobody from the South seemed to favor originally. What is this section 7, about which the affections of so many seem to be entwined to-day? It is as follows:

SEC. 7. That every common carrier, engaged in interstate commerce, shall, under such regulations, restrictions, and safeguards as may be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, receive, carry, and transport through any State or Territory necessary to complete the journey or carriage into a State wherein delivery or debarkation may be lawful, all passengers, freight, or baggage which may have been discharged and properly certified in accordance with the regulations of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service; and every person interfering with or obstructing such carrier or any passenger or any instrumentality of commerce in any such carriage or journey shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned for a period not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That this section shall not be construed as giving authority to any person to debark or unload freight in any locality contrary to the lawful regulations thereof.

There are eight sections in this bill. The last provides for an appropriation. The first six are quarantine sections. They deal with the means of protecting this country against disease. They provide methods of inspection and disinfection of persons and property; they throw restrictions about the movement of persons and property, in order to reduce the danger of infection being carried from one point to another. Section 7 is in contradiction to all the other sections. It is not a quarantine section; it is a commercial section. It places no embargo upon the movement of persons and property from infected to noninfected points, but facilitates such movement. It does not lessen the opportunities for the transmission of disease; it increases them. It will not check yellow fever; it will spread it. It does not look to the protection of life and health of the people; it protects the railroads. It is not responsive to the demands of the people; it is in obedience to the behests of the transportation companies. It subordinates the rights of the States and the lives of human beings to the right of railroad companies to pile up earnings to satisfy the greed of stockholders. It is one more testimonial to commercialized spirit of this age, when even a measure for the protection of human life can not escape the tainting touch of railroad influences.

I do not know in whose mind this section originated, but it is apparent that it was conceived for the double purpose of aiding the transportation companies to run their trains without regard for life and of destroying the power of the State to protect itself in its own way and under its own laws.

Under the pretended authority of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution it compels a State to permit a railroad train to run through its limits, even though such train may be loaded down with people scourged by the "yellow peril." But gentlemen say that under this bill passengers are not permitted to leave the train contrary to the "lawful regulations" of a State. It is not necesary for a single passenger to put his foot upon Texas soil to endanger the lives of our people. A single infected mosquito escaping from such a train might be the messenger of death to a thousand.

We protest against this section as a vicious, unwaranted, and unnecessary interference with the right of a State to protect its people by requiring those coming from infected points to remain in detention until the danger is past. If Congress can compel Texas to permit a train of yellow-fever-infected people to pass through Texas with Colorado as their destination, Congress can compel Texas to permit them to stop in Texas. It is no more interstate commerce in the one case than in the other.

So far as Texas is concerned, she is moved by no spirit of hostility to other States in her opposition to this bill. She sympathizes with any people who are afflicted with the yellow-fever scourge. Gentlemen have spoken complainingly about the hardships imposed, in occasional instances, by her quarantine regulations. I concede that in many instances great inconvenience results. This can not be avoided. Our regulations are based upon the theory that it is better that a few should suffer hardship and inconvenience rather than that the grisly horror of disease and death should come to the many. In carrying out this policy we do not impose any greater burdens upon the people from infected States who seek entrance into Texas than we impose under like conditions upon our own people. When Laredo and San Antonio had yellow fever a few years ago Texas gave them every resource at her command to stamp out the disease, and in the case of San Antonio this was done in a very brief time; but so long as there was danger no person was permitted to leave Laredo or San Antonio except by complying with the very same regulations that were enforced upon the border line of Texas and Louisiana last year.

So effective was our quarantine last year that, while the specter that casts its shadow upon the palace and the hovel alike visited almost every parish in our sister State of Louisiana and came almost within sight of our Texas border, there was not one single case in Texas. Measured by such results as this, how petty and unreasonable seems this outcry against the hardships of our system. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] in his remarks some days ago complained because the governor of Arkansas would not permit a train load of refugees from fever-infected points in Louisiana to pass through Arkansas, and then he admits that by the time that train reached the capital of Kentucky seven cases of yellow fever had developed on it. The purpose of section 7 of this bill is to compel States under just such circumstances to permit the passage of such trains.

Mr. Speaker, Texas does not want to surrender this last relic of State sovereignty to the Federal Government. While she has welcomed the aid and cooperation of the Washington Government when her cities have been stricken, she would forego that assistance rather than yield up the right to guard her own border and to protect her own people. We have never been a mendicant asking favors, but when in times of danger help has been offered her she has accepted it without the sacrifice of her dignity or honor.

Gentlemen have seen proper to taunt us with the statement that we have appealed to the Government here for aid in the effort to exterminate the boll weevil. This is an unfortunate argument for gentlemen to make. We did ask the Federal Government to assist us in that effort. We were already afflicted. We did not ask the Government at Washington to assist us in sending infection to the cotton fields of Louisiana and Mississippi. We asked the Federal Government to help us confine it to the area already infected, and to prevent its spread. We asked Congress to aid us to make it impossible for your fields to be ravaged, while you now beg Congress to disarm the protecting sentinel that stands guard before the door of every Texas home. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the contest of to-day is but a renewal of the struggle that began with the establishment of our Government and has continued under varying forms and conditions ever since—an effort to take from the States some part of the power originally given to them to vest it in the General Government. In my judgment no single piece of legislation has ever done more to magnify the one and to degrade the other than will this bill if it is enacted into law. Our regret over this lamentable result is increased by the reflection that in other days the people of the South have stood steadfastly as the defenders of the faith of the fathers, while to-day this crusade for the dishonor of the States is led by those coming from what has heretofore been the very citadel of State sovereignty.

So far as we of Texas are concerned, we are determined not to sacrifice the old faith even to plunder the Treasury, nor to sacrifice the safety of our people even to accommodate the wishes of great transportation companies. Our faith may be simple and antiquated, but we cling to it because we believe that to preserve the integrity of the States is to preserve the whole fabric of our free Government; because we believe that when the States become mere geographical divisions, losing their political power and autonomy, then our Government will differ but little from the monarchies of Europe. We of Texas still believe that the individual citizen is the true political unit of this country, and that he ought to possess all the rights bestowed upon him by nature, except such as he surrenders for the public good. We still believe that the States are the repositories of political authority, entitled to exercise all power except such as they have voluntarily surrendered to the General Government, and that this Government can rightfully and righteously exercise only such power as the States have expressly given it or have given it by just and proper implication. So believing, it is not strange that we oppose this bill that strips the States of a power that they have exercised for almost a century and a quarter, and that attempts to give to the General Government a right that it never asserted until now.

We deny that Congress has the power to legislate in the manner proposed by this bill. We claim that it is a matter wholly within the power of the States. In determining whether this is true, we think it is proper to start out with the presumption that it is a power vested in the States. Under our system of Government this must be true unless the States have voluntarily surrendered this power to the Federal Government. The States have never yielded any powers originally belonging to them except in two ways, either by direct grant of power to the Federal Government or by the implied power made necessary and proper to carry into effect some expressed power.

The first seventeen paragraphs of section 8, Article I, of the Constitution, make express grants of certain powers to Congress, and paragraph 18 of the same section and article says that Congress shall have power—to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution of the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

Nobody contends that there is any express grant of power to Congress to legislate upon such matters as interstate quarantine, or upon any other matters coming within the jurisdiction of the police powers of the States. Does Congress possess any implied power to do so? Under the clause of the Constitution quoted above, before a proposed statute is authorized under the implied power of Congress to legislate, it must appear that such statute is necessary and proper for carrying into effect some power expressly granted. What express grant of power is there in the Constitution which it is necessary and proper to make effective by Congress vesting control of quarantine regulations in the General Government? The "general welfare" clause can not even be invoked, for it relates wholly to the purposes for which Congress can impose taxation.

It has been urged here that the authority is found under the clause of the Constitution under which Congress is given the power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States." Nobody denies that under this clause Congress has exclusive jurisdiction, if it chooses to exercise it, over interstate commerce, and that, in conjunction with this express power, it has all additional power "necessary and proper" to carry into effect this power. But the authority to regulate interstate commerce does not imply the power to administer interstate quarantine. Chief Justice Taney (5 How., p. 576) says:

It must be remembered that disease, pestilence, and pauperism are not subjects of commerce, although sometimes among its attendant evils. They are not things to be regulated or trafficked in, but to be prevented, as far as human foresight or human means can guard against them.

In the argument of the Passenger cases the following words were used:

Suppose a citizen or an alien, no matter whom, the President of the United States or the humblest individual that ever entered the harbor to approach our city, bringing infection, bearing death to thousands—an approach more dreadful than that of an invading army. He is repelled, justly repelled, by the express authority of the law of nations. By whom is he repelled? By the Federal Government? Under what clause of the Constitution? Under which of its powers? Under its commercial power? A traffic in contagion! A tariff on disease! Under its war power? A war with the king of terrors! No; the State, and the State alone, has the power, and alone is charged with the duty of repelling disease and of guarding its confines from the entrance of whatever might injure its citizens.

There is no attempt to "regulate" commerce under any of the quarantine laws of any of the States. But gentlemen say that commerce is "affected" by State quarantine regulations. I concede that this is often true, but the power of Congress to regulate commerce is subordinate to the right of the State to protect itself against the introduction of disease, even though commerce may be affected thereby, provided the State exercises its power in a reasonable manner.

Daniel Webster, in arguing the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, admitted that quarantine laws affected commerce, but did not regulate it as long as they remained reasonable and were not used as a color for other purposes. The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States have been numerous upon this point. In the Slaughter House case, Judge Miller says (16 Wall., p. 63):

The exclusive authority of State legislatures over this subject is strikingly illustrated in the case of City of New York v. Miln. In that case the defendant was prosecuted for failing to comply with a statute of New York which required of every master of a vessel arriving from a foreign port, in that of New York City, to report the names of all his passengers, with certain particulars of their age, occupation, last place of settlement, and place of their birth. It was argued that this act was an invasion of the exclusive right of Congress to regulate commerce. And it can not be denied that such a statute operated at least indirectly upon the commercial intercourse between the citizens of the United States and foreign countries. But notwithstanding this it was held to be an exercise of the police power properly within the control of the State and unaffected by the clause of the Constitution which conferred on Congress the right to regulate commerce.

In Patterson v. Kentucky (97 U. S., p. 505) Judge Harlan says:

We have frequently decided that the police power of the States was not surrendered when the Constitution conferred upon Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the several States. Hence the States may, by police regulations, protect their people against the introduction within their respective limits of infected merchandise. A bale of goods upon which duties have or have not been paid, laden with infection, may be seized under health laws, and if it can not be purged of its poison, may be committed to the flames. So may the States by like regulations exclude from their midst not only convicts, paupers, idiots, lunatics, and persons likely to become a public charge, but animals having contagious diseases. This court has never hesitated, by the most rigid rules of construction, to guard the commercial power of Congress against encroachments in the form or under the guise of State regulations, established for the purpose and with the effect of destroying or impairing rights secured by the Constitution. It has, nevertheless, with marked distinctness and uniformity recognized the necessity, growing out of the fundamental conditions of civil society, of upholding State police regulations which were enacted in good faith, and had appropriate and direct connection with that protection to life, health, and property which each State owes to her citizens.

In the Passenger cases (7 How., p. 400) Judge McLean says:

In giving the commercial power to Congress the States did not part with that power of self-preservation which must be inherent in every organized community. They may guard against the introduction of anything which may corrupt the morals or endanger the health or lives of their citizens.

In Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheaton, p. 235) Judge Johnson says:

It is no objection to the existence of distinct, substantive powers that, in the application, they bear upon the same subject. The same bale of goods, the same cask of provisions, or the same ship, that may be the subject of commercial regulation, may also be the vehicle of disease. And the health laws that require them to be stopped and ventilated are no more intended as regulations on commerce than the laws which permit their importation are intended to inoculate the community with disease. Their different purposes mark the distinction between the powers brought into action; and while frankly exercised they can produce no serious collision.

In the License cases (5 How., p. 589) Mr. Justice McLean said:

The license acts of Massachusetts do not purport to be a regulation of commerce. They are police laws. Enactments similar in principle are common to all the States. * * * The acknowledged police power of a State extends often to the destruction of property. A nuisance may be abated. Everything prejudicial to the health or morals of a city may be removed. Merchandise from a port where a contagious disease prevails, being liable to communicate the disease, may be excluded; and in extreme cases it may be thrown into the sea. This comes in direct conflict with the regulation of commerce; and yet no one doubts the local power. It is a power essential to self-preservation and exists necessarily in every organized community. It is indeed the law of nature, and is possessed by man in his individual capacity. He may resist that which does him harm, whether he be assailed by an assassin or approached by poison. And it is the settled construction of every regulation of commerce that, under the sanction of its general laws, no person can introduce into a community malignant diseases or anything which contaminates its morals or endangers its safety. And this is an acknowledged principle applicable to all general regulations. Individuals in the enjoyment of their own rights must be careful not to injure the rights of others.

From the explosive nature of gunpowder a city may exclude it. Now, this is an article of commerce, and is not known to carry infectious disease; yet to guard against a contingent injury a city may prohibit its introduction. These exceptions are always implied in commercial regulations where the General Government is admitted to have exclusive power.

They are not regulations of commerce, but acts of self-preservation. And although they affect commerce to some extent, yet such effect is the result of the exercise of an undoubted power in the State.

In the Passenger cases, before referred to, Judge Wayne says:

That the States of the Union may, in the exercise of their police powers, pass quarantine and health laws interdicting vessels coming from foreign ports or ports within the United States from landing passengers and goods, describe the places and time for vessels to quarantine, and impose penalties upon persons for violating the same, and that such laws, though affecting commerce in its transit, are not regulations of commerce, prescribing terms upon which merchandise and persons shall be admitted into the ports of the United States, but precautionary regulations to prevent vessels engaged in commerce from introducing disease into the ports for which they are bound, and that the States may, in the exercise of such police power, without any violation of the power in Congress to regulate commerce, exact from the owner or consignee of a quarantined vessel, and from the passengers on board of her, such fees as will pay to the State the cost of their detention and of the purification of the vessel, cargo, and apparel of the persons on board.

For the collection of these interesting and, I think, conclusive authorities we are greatly indebted to the legal learning and industry of Edgar H. Farrar, esq., a distinguished member of the New Orleans bar, who presented them in an admirable discussion before the Mobile quarantine convention in 1898.

I do not believe that it can be successfully contended that the Supreme Court of the United States has ever decided, in any case where the proposition was directly before it and necessary to be decided, that Congress has the right to assume jurisdiction over matters of quarantine between the States, or has the right to restrict the States in the exercise of any right that, in sound discretion, they may see proper and necessary to exercise to prevent the introduction of disease, or has ever held that the authority of the States is not exclusive upon such matters.

I am aware of the fact that in recent years that tribunal has, by way of obiter dictum, suggested that the authority of a State to legislate upon the subject of quarantine would be abrogated if Congress should see fit to enact a general quarantine law. I insist, however, that in none of these cases has such a proposition been presented or argued before the court or necessary to the decision of any case, and that if that court should ever hold such a vicious doctrine it must overrule the decisions of the best and wisest judges that have ever graced that great tribunal.

I believe that the true rule is that quarantine regulations come within the exercise of the police powers of a State that can not be interfered with by the Federal Government. These police powers inhere in every original sovereignty and they existed before any constitutions were adopted. Every State possesses, and must possess the power to legislate exclusively within its limits upon matters relating to the protection of health, life, comfort, and well-being of its people and in relation to the property rights of its citizens. If the Federal Government can invade the sovereignty of a State to the extent of taking away one of its police powers, it can take them all away. If it can deprive a State of the right to protect the lives of its citizens against disease, with equal reason it can deny to a State the right to protect its citizens against murderous assaults or the property of the State against arson. Nobody will now contend that Congress has authority to legislate with respect to any of the matters last named, yet these do not come any more clearly within the police powers of the State than the quarantine power does.

Chief Justice Marshall, in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., p. 203), says:

> Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State, and those which respect turnpikes, roads, etc., form a part of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government. No direct power over these subjects is granted to Congress, and consequently they remain subject to State legislation.

Gentlemen say that in some of the States the power to administer its quarantine affairs is not properly exercised. It has never been considered within the province of Congress to inquire whether the States are exercising wisely or well any of the police powers inherent in them. Congress may not believe that the criminal laws of a State are wisely drawn or justly administered, yet Congress has no right because of this belief to deprive a State of any part of its jurisdiction over offenses committed within its limits and against the "peace and dignity of the State."

If it be said that the assumption of this power by Congress would result in more uniform regulation, the same may be said with equal force in regard to the administration of the divorce laws and in reference to many other matters over which the jurisdiction of the States is admitted to be exclusive. It is one of the penalties we have to pay for having our dual system of government, and these distinctions and differences in the laws of different States and in the methods of their administration will not cease until the work of destruction of the States already begun, is completed.

Gentlemen say that the Federal Government can administer quarantine laws more effectively than the State. I deny the proposition. I contend that the proposition is true that the closer you bring home to the people the administration of any law for their protection the more effective will be its enforcement. I do not believe that the Government at Washington can administer any of the affairs of Texas with as much wisdom or with as good results as can the people of Texas themselves. The truth of the matter is that I do not believe that the Federal Government can do anything as well as Texas can do it. Gentlemen having less faith in their own States may have reason for their desire to surrender the rights of their States to the Federal Government, but Texans do not want to do so. We want the Federal Government to exercise to the fullest extent that necessity may require every power that has been given to it, but we want it to go no further. We do not want to take from it a single power that it rightfully has, but we do not want to surrender to it a single power which it has not.

As I view it, I fear that the political evolutions of the past twenty-five years have been so great that we are now face to face with the proposition as to whether or not it is wise to longer attempt to maintain our Government under the theory under which it was first established. Every man here takes an oath to support the Constitution, but many crack it by the liberality of construction they give to it. By word of mouth they promise to observe the written Constitution that says that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people," but by their conduct they interpret it to vest in the General Government all power not expressly denied to it. The question is whether we will have an "indissoluble union of indestructible States" or whether we will have a nation made up of petty provinces and dependencies. There are many who will seriously assert that the present trend toward centralization is for the better, and that we have outgrown the government of the fathers. If this be true, then it should be changed in the way provided by the Constitution for its amendment and not by its annulment and the willful usurpation of power.

I call the attention of gentlemen from the South to a recent address of Secretary Shaw, delivered at Baltimore, in which he discusses the present drift toward centralization and refers, with evident satisfaction, to the fact that the leaders of the old party that had always opposed this tendency were now clamoring that Federal authority should now extend farther than it had ever gone before.

He says:

> The Federal Government has exercised the authority vouchsafed in the Constitution in supervising international and interstate commerce. The national banking act, antitrust legislation, and railway supervision are well-marked instances of the trend toward a stronger central government. Have we reached the limit? It would seem not. The demand for Federal supervision of corporations, for insurance control, for additional rate legislation, for government inspection of foods, all look in the same direction, and to add to the prospect of a yet stronger and more centralized government I cite the fact that the old State sovereignty party has now become the most pronounced advocate of enlarged Federal jurisdiction and supervision. The people of the United States are becoming Hamiltonians very rapidly.

If he was not referring to your action upon this very bill, then to what did he refer?

I do not believe in this spirit of centralization. I believe that our Government as originally established was the wisest and best product of mortal man, and I believe that our safety, liberty, and happiness depend upon preserving it as it was given to us.

I concede that a great part of the agitation of to-day for additional power to the Federal Government is due to the failure of the States to exercise at all, or to exercise wisely, the functions belonging to them. They have failed to exercise the jurisdiction they possess over many subjects, and the people, impelled by the realization that conditions are not as they should be, have turned to the Federal Government for relief. Take some familiar illustrations. If the States had regulated and controlled with energy and diligence the great insurance companies operating within their respective limits, the scandals and crimes revealed by the recent disclosures would have been avoided and the demand for Federal supervision would not have been urged. If the States would do their duty in providing proper public highways for the comfort and convenience of their people, the demand for Federal aid in road building would never have been countenanced for a moment. If the States had vigorously asserted their right to control the sale of food products and to prevent imposition upon their people by food adulterations, then the so-called "pure-food" crusade would never have been started.

The remedy for many of the ills of the present conditions is largely with the people of the States. If they will demand, and rigorously enforce their demand, that the States exercise the powers belonging to them, the States will grow vigorous and strong again. If the people do not jealously guard their rights and compel their States to assert and maintain all their functions, they need not expect the dignity and power of the States to be maintained. The immutable laws of nature apply with equal force to an individual and to a State. The muscles of a blacksmith are harder and stronger than the muscles of a banker simply because they are used more. Bind the arm of the blacksmith to his side and in time it will become limp and helpless. So it is with a State. The failure to use any of the powers belonging to it will so enervate and enfeeble it that it will lose the power to perform the high functions of statehood belonging to it.

Gentlemen clamor for a great nation. I, too, want a great nation. I want it composed of great States, and these filled with great people. The process of nation building should begin with the people. To build up a great bureaucratic and centralized machine here in Washington will not make us great; it will dwarf the States and enervate the people. Make the people great by leaving to them the fullest measure of self-government and they will maintain great States, and these will make a nation of enduring greatness. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I will ask if the gentleman from Louisiana desires to use any of his time now?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has two minutes remaining.

Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana. I do not wish to use any at the present time.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would like to have the gentleman from Louisiana use some of his time now.

The SPEAKER. The usage is that if the gentleman from Louisiana has only one speech in conclusion, he may require the gentleman from Georgia to use the balance of his time.

Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to use more than one or two minutes in conclusion. There will be no debate on this side.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then, Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. FIELD].

Mr. FIELD. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for me to be of any service in the consideration of this bill in two minutes' time, and I therefore yield back the time to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, it is not my desire or my intention to delay a vote on this motion. I desire to assure the House that this is one of the most important subjects now before Congress in which our people of the State of Louisiana are interested. If gentlemen who have taken part in this debate had gone through a yellow-fever epidemic, as I have, they would not stand here upon technicalities. I have taken part in every yellow-fever epidemic since my birth, during the great epidemic of 1853. I have seen sights that I hope no Member of this House will ever see. I have seen them dying, and I have seen them dead. Mr. Speaker, there is no law strong enough for me to vote for that would keep the yellow-fever plague from the boundaries of the United States. The people of Louisiana today are feeling unrestful about the coming season. It is not that the quarantine time is coming, but it is here, and unless there be some relief given within a very short time, it would be useless, as it could do no good.

Now, Mr. Speaker, so that I may not waste the time of the House, I ask for a vote on this question. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. As many as are in favor of the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendment indicated in the nature of a substitute and the amendment of the title——

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the substitute or to the Senate bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not under this motion.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, would it not be in order by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The House could do anything by unanimous consent.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment striking out section 7 and to substitute therefor——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARTLETT and Mr. BEALL of Texas) there were—ayes 172, noes 22.

So, two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN TENNESSEE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In view of the following report from the Attorney-General I return herewith, without approval, House bill No. 20:

"I have the honor to reply to your letter of April 13, wherein you ask to be advised whether I know of objection to the approval of H. R. 20, 'An act to change and fix the time for holding circuit and district courts of the United States for the middle district of Tennessee; in the southern division of the eastern district of Tennessee at Chattanooga, and the northeastern division of the eastern district of Tennessee, at Greeneville, and for other purposes.'

"Under the statutes in force in Tennessee for a long time regular terms of the Federal courts at Nashville should commence on the third Monday of April, which this year is the 16th day.

"I am advised that preparation has already been made for holding the terms during the present month, and that witnesses and jurors have been summoned therefor. To postpone the terms until the first Monday in May, as provided in the bill, might be productive of serious inconvenience.

"As the result of many months of work by this Department arrangements have been made to bring before the grand jury at Nashville, already summoned, certain matters of great concern to the Government, and it may be important that it continue during a considerable period.

"In view of the peculiar circumstances relating to the approaching terms of courts at Nashville it appears to me that the interest of the Government will be best subserved if you withhold your approval from the bill."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 16, 1906.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message and the accompanying document be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the message and the accompanying document be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

COMPAÑÍA DE LOS FERROCARRILES DE PUERTO RICO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 11976) for the relief of the Compañía de los Ferrocarriles de Puerto Rico, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

ENTRY OF AGRICULTURAL LANDS WITHIN FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17576) to provide for the entry of agricultural lands within forest reserves, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, and he is hereby authorized, upon application or otherwise, to examine and ascertain as to the location and extent of lands within permanent or temporary forest reserves, except in the State of California, which are chiefly valuable for agriculture, and which, in his opinion, may be occupied for agricultural purposes without injury to the forest reserves, and which are not needed for public purposes, and may list and describe the same by metes and bounds, or otherwise, and file the lists and descriptions with the Secretary of the Interior, with the request that the said lands be opened to entry in accordance with the provisions of the homestead laws and this act.

Upon the filing of any such list or description the Secretary of the Interior shall declare the said lands open to homestead settlement and entry in tracts not exceeding 160 acres in area and not exceeding 1½ miles in length, at the expiration of sixty days from the filing of the list in the land office of the district within which the lands are located, during which period the said list or description shall be prominently posted in the land office and advertised for a period of not less than four weeks in one newspaper of general circulation published in the county in which the lands are situated: Provided, That any settler actually occupying and in good faith claiming such lands for agricultural purposes prior to January 1, 1906, and who shall not have abandoned the same, and the person, if qualified to make a homestead entry, upon whose application the land proposed to be entered was examined and listed, shall, each in the order named, have a preference right of settlement and entry: Provided further, That any entryman desiring to obtain patent to any lands described by metes and bounds entered by him under the provisions of this act shall, within five years of the date of making settlement, file, with the required proof of residence and cultivation, a plat and field notes of the lands entered, made by or under the direction of the United States surveyor-general, showing accurately the boundaries of such lands, which shall be distinctly marked by monuments on the ground, and by posting a copy of such plat, together with a notice of the time and place of offering proof, in a conspicuous place on the land embraced in such plat during the period prescribed by law for the publication of his notice of intention to offer proof, and that a copy of such plat and field notes shall also be kept posted in the office of the register of the land office for the land district in which such lands are situated for a like period; and further, that any agricultural lands within forest reserves may, at the discretion of the Secretary, be surveyed by metes and bounds, and that no lands entered under the provisions of this act shall be patented under the commutation provisions of the homestead laws, but settlers, upon final proof, shall have credit for the period of their actual residence upon the lands covered by their entries: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture may set aside such forest reserve lands as were not occupied by a bona fide settler January 1, 1906, when he considers them necessary for forest reserve administrative purposes, which lands so set aside shall be listed in the local land office and shall not be subject to settlement entry or location under the public-land laws during the life of the forest reserve in which they are situated, or until such lists are revoked by the Secretary.

SEC. 2. That settlers upon lands chiefly valuable for agriculture within forest reserves on January 1, 1906, who have already exercised or lost their homestead privilege, but are otherwise competent to enter lands under the homestead laws, are hereby granted an additional homestead right of entry for the purposes of this act only, and such settlers must otherwise comply with the provisions of the homestead law, and in addition thereto must pay $2.50 per acre for lands entered under the provisions of this section, such payment to be made at the time of making final proof on such lands.

SEC. 3. That all entries under this act in the Black Hills Forest Reserve shall be subject to the quartz or lode mining laws of the United States, and the laws and regulations permitting the location, appropriation, and use of the waters within the said forest reserves for mining, irrigation, and other purposes; and no titles acquired to agricultural lands under this act shall vest in the patentee any riparian rights to any stream or streams of flowing water within said reserves; and that such limitation of title shall be expressed in the patents for the lands covered by such entries.

SEC. 4. That no homestead settlements or entries shall be allowed in that portion of the Black Hills Forest Reserve in Lawrence and Pennington counties in South Dakota except to persons occupying lands therein prior to January 1, 1906, and the homestead provisions of this act shall apply to the said counties in said reserve only so far as is necessary to give and perfect title of such settlers or occupants to lands chiefly valuable for agriculture therein occupied or claimed by them prior to the said date, and all homestead entries under this act in said counties in said reserve shall be described by metes and bounds survey.

SEC. 5. That nothing herein contained shall be held to authorize any future settlement on any lands within forest reserves until such lands have been opened to settlement as provided in this act, or to in any way impair the legal rights of any bona fide homestead settler who has or shall establish residence upon public lands prior to their inclusion within a forest reserve.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 4, strike out "and one-half miles" and insert "mile."

Page 4, line 16, after "lands," insert "in said Black Hills Forest Reserve."

Page 4, line 18, strike out "reserves" and insert "reserve;" and in line 24, page 4, strike out the word "homestead."

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following additional amendments, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, beginning with line 17, strike out the proviso down to and including line 25.

On pages 4 and 5 strike out sections 3 and 4, and change the sectional numbering.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman for an explanation of the bill. In the first place, is that bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. It is.

Mr. PAYNE. And has it the approval of the Department?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. As I understand it, it applies to all forest reserves except those in the State of California?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. And is a general bill to do what we have been doing by special bills for some time past in reference to forest reserves?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Is there any price fixed for the sale of these lands—minimum price?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. No.

Mr. PAYNE. No price of $2.50 an acre?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is a statement of the correct situation. It is the Department bill drawn up by them to allow homestead entries on agricultural lands when they shall file the list in the regular Land Office. The provision of $2.50 an acre applies only to some persons who are situated in some of the far-distant reserves, where they had exercised the right of homestead, and in other cases they are made to pay $2.50 an acre for the lands which they have occupied.

Mr. PAYNE. Is that price fixed in this bill with sufficient deliberation, so that the matter will not come back here again with a motion to correct it by making it $5 or $7?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I think it is. It is the recommendation of the Commission appointed by the President to recommend legislation concerning forest reserves.

Mr. PAYNE. After an examination?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. After an examination.

Mr. PAYNE. I notice that he gives preference to people there unlawfully, according to the usual terms, in this bill.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I talked with the chief forester, and he said it was an equitable provision for a few people who had lived there for years, whom they did not want to dispossess, and they would pay the $2.50 an acre.

Mr. PAYNE. Is not there a great deal of danger to the forests and timber in the forest reservations by bringing this population in there?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. No; it only applies to little agricultural valleys that run through the reservations. By Executive order, I remember once in my own State 6,000,000 acres were put in a forest reserve, and scattered through those 6,000,000 acres are various little mountain valleys which will sustain a population, and it is to provide for that settlement in these valleys that they have prepared the bill in the Department, and they leave the discretion to the Secretary.

Mr. PAYNE. This bill requires the Secretary to segregate all lands in all forest reserves that are set apart for agricultural purposes.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Yes; all over the country except California; California did not want it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOGG. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object until I can ask a question in regard to this. I would like to ask the gentleman from Montana, if he thinks it a wise provision to allow agricultural land anywhere to be sold at the discretion of any Secretary, whether Secretary of the Interior or Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. As a general proposition, I would say to the gentleman from Colorado I would not, but we wanted relief. The Department asked that it remain discretionary with the Secretary, and realizing the need of relief from the situation which now presents itself in the West, we took half a loaf as being better than no bread.

Mr. HOGG. The present condition of the public domain is this, is it not, that at the discretion of the President this entire domain may be put into the forest reserve?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. The President, by Executive order, can put half a State in a reserve if he wants to do so.

Mr. HOGG. It can not be taken out until the discretion of some Secretary is exercised.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. That is the provision of the bill.

Mr. HOGG. Would you have any objection to correcting this bill or amending it in the third line where it says that, "the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, and he is hereby authorized upon application or otherwise to examine and ascertain," to amend the bill so it will read, that the Secretary of Agriculture shall upon application or otherwise examine and ascertain?"

Mr. DIXON of Montana. If the gentleman will offer that amendment, I will gladly accept it, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. HOGG. I would move, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. One moment——

Mr. LACEY. I would object to that amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will not object. I apprehend that is one of the best amendments that can be put on this bill. I am in full sympathy with the object of the bill, and I believe the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado will meet the views of the entire western people. I understand the conditions there, and as long as it is left in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture or any Department here in Washington to release these immense amounts of land that are now held we might not get the relief that is demanded and needed in the western country, and I hope the gentleman from Iowa will not interpose an objection, but I will ask the gentleman this question: He understands the mineral law now permits a man to go upon lands in the West, and if they are chiefly valuable for minerals he can make his mineral entry upon this land. Now, why should you make a distinction between the miner and the farmer? When the land is chiefly valuable for agriculture, why should not you protect the farmer and permit him to go upon these forest reserves and take his homestead?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to unanimous consent to consider this bill at this time?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I was only insisting that the amendment proposed was a right and proper one.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair desires to know whether there is objection or not.

Mr. HOGG. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to object, but I do wish the gentleman from Iowa would withdraw his objection.

Mr. LACEY. I have not objected to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has asked if anybody objects. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to object to the consideration of the bill, but I desire, however, to have some time to discuss it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears objection; that is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill with amendment that has been read. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana [Mr. DIXON] is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to twenty minutes.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I reserve my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana [Mr. DIXON] reserves his time. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object to the passage of this measure, but I think it is a bill that should be very carefully considered and thoroughly understood by the House. It may affect the title to considerable tracts within the 90,000,000 acres of land now in forest reserves and other millions of acres which may hereafter be included in forest reserves. The necessity for this legislation, if there be any considerable necessity for it outside of the Black Hills Forest Reserve, to which its provisions now apply, so far as the action of the House can make them apply, arises from the fact that in violation of the spirit of the forest-reserve law, in my opinion, if not the letter of that statute, forest reserves have been extended over territory more valuable for agricultural purposes than for forest reserves. And what I fear is that the passage of this act, giving the Secretary of Agriculture authority, in his discretion, to provide for the entry under the homestead law of agricultural lands within forest reserves, will lead to the very great extension of the reserves. One of the strongest arguments against the extension of reserves up to this time has been that there has been included in forest reserves in the past vast areas of grazing lands and some considerable areas of agricultural lands. This is contrary to the spirit of the law, if not to its letter. And the opposition to the reserves in the West has been in the main—that portion of it, at least, which is best founded—to the inclusion of great areas of grazing lands and of some considerable areas of farming lands.

Now, if we give to the Secretary of Agriculture authority to suggest to the Secretary of the Interior that certain lands shall be open to entry and make it the duty of the Secretary of the Interior upon such request to open such lands, the tendency will be, in my opinion, to encourage the Forestry Bureau in the very great extension of forest reserves.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will my friend permit me?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Is there room left for any more forest reserves?

Mr. MONDELL. I think that here and there in the gentleman's country there may be patches of brush and in my country, perhaps, an occasional sagebush or a straggly mountain cedar that might be made the basis of a forest reserve.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. They have all of those in my country.

Mr. MONDELL. They have most of them all over the West. There is an area in forest reserves three times the size of the great State of Iowa. There is an area withdrawn with the view of including it in reserves of 40,000,000 acres, twice the area of the average State. And my theory is that this legislation will tend to the inclusion of further large areas in the reserves, with the view of bringing under the jurisdiction of the Forestry Bureau every considerable tract of land on the public domain that contains any kind of a bush, brush, or tree, thereby repealing the timber and stone act and the commutation clause of the homestead law, so far as those areas are concerned, and leaving it entirely with the Secretary of Agriculture to say whether here and there, in order to minimize or mollify opposition to these great increases of area, he will begrudgingly open small areas to homestead settlement. So far as my experience goes, I believe we would do much better if those of the West interested in the regions in which these reserves are established should unitedly demand that the exterior boundaries of the reserves should be so modified as to exclude all agricultural and grazing lands. In the interior of the reservations, where there are any considerable areas of land fit for farming and grazing, these, too, should be excluded from the reservations, as they may be by proclamation of the President. I believe that is a better policy to follow than the policy laid down and provided for in this bill. Yet I shall not oppose it, because it is possible that under the act some tracts may be opened and give to the farmer and homesteader an opportunity to go within forest reserves and settle upon agricultural lands. As a matter of fact, the bill holds out a hope that may be, and in the majority of cases probably will be, denied. No one should be deceived into believing that this legislation authorizes them to go within forest reserves and settle upon tracts of untimbered land, because the bill contains no provision warranting anything of the kind. It simply provides another possible remedy in addition to that now in the hands of the President whereby he may exclude from forest reservation lands not forested and which should not have been included in forest reserves, by providing that the Secretary of Agriculture may designate areas here and there that in his discretion may be opened to entry without injury to the reservation or any other public purpose.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may want to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, there are now not far from a hundred million acres of land under forest reservation. Of necessity this includes a number of small valleys and desirable agricultural lands which should not be taken away from the agricultural area. The Public Lands Commission, which has been considering the various laws in connection with the public lands for the last two years, in their report made on the 7th day of March, 1904, made a recommendation for this legislation. The Commission says:

AGRICULTURAL LAND IN FOREST RESERVES.

However carefully the boundaries of forest reserves may be selected, it is practically inevitable that more or less agricultural land should be included. Such land usually lies in the narrow valleys of the rivers. Its occupation for agricultural purposes is in the interest of the region in which it lies and of the settlers who would make homes upon it. The presence of the latter in the reserves would, under wise laws, operate distinctly for the protection and general advantage of the reserves. It is essential to the prosperity of the public-land States both that the forest reserves should be maintained and that all of the land within their borders should be put to its best use. To exclude all agricultural lands by Presidential proclamation is not feasible, because of their small area, scattered location, and irregular boundaries. Therefore we recommend that such lands be opened to agricultural entry in the following way:

That the Secretary having supervision of forest reserves may, upon application or otherwise, ascertain, list, and describe, by metes and bounds or otherwise, lands within such reserves which are chiefly valuable for agriculture, and that the lands so listed may, at the expiration of ninety days from the filing of such lists in the land office of the land district in which they are situated, be disposed of to actual settlers under the homestead laws only, in tracts not exceeding 160 acres in area and not exceeding 1½ miles in length; that when such lands are ascertained and listed upon the application of any person qualified to make homestead entry, such applicant may settle upon and enter such lands thirty days after the date of such filing; that no person settling upon, entering, or occupying such lands shall thereby have a right to use any other lands within such reserve for grazing or other purposes; that any entryman desiring to obtain patent to any lands, described by metes and bounds, entered by him under the provisions of this act, may do so by filing, with the required proof of residence and cultivation, a plat and field notes of the lands entered, made by or under the direction of the United States surveyor-general, showing accurately the boundaries of such lands, which shall be distinctly marked by monuments on the ground, and shall post a copy of such plat, together with a notice of the time and place of offering proof, in a conspicuous place on the land embraced in such plat during the period prescribed for the publication of his notice of intention to offer proof, and that a copy of such plat and field notes shall also be kept posted in the office of the register of the land office for the land district in which such lands are situated for a like period; and further, that any agricultural lands within forest reserves may, at the discretion of the Secretary, be surveyed by metes and bounds, but that no lands entered under these provisions shall be patented under the commutation provisions of the homestead laws or be exchanged for other public lands.

To open the reserves to homestead entry without restriction would be in effect to abolish them. We therefore recommend that the agricultural character of the lands should be officially ascertained, as has been the habit hitherto in the case of agricultural and mineral lands.

The effect of the foregoing provisions is to give an intending settler the right to apply for the particular agricultural land he wants and sixty days' preference in entering it. Through survey by metes and bounds the settler is enabled to take the full amount of 160 acres of actual agricultural land. The principal danger in the administration of this plan is likely to arise from the desire of others than actual settlers to get possession of valuable timber lands on the plea that they are agricultural in character, to cut the timber from the lands, and then abandon them, to the serious injury of the interests which the reserves are created to serve.

Such an abuse would be greatly facilitated by the commutation clause of the homestead act, whereas actual settlers on agricultural lands in forest reserves would seldom or never suffer hardship from the requirement of five years' residence. Agricultural lands in forest reserves are not wholly on the same plane as such lands outside, because their use must be subservient to the purposes for which the reserves were created. Their actual occupation by permanent settlers is of the first importance to this object, and shifting of ownership during the first years of settlement and development would be of serious injury to the reserves. We are of the opinion that to allow the application of the commutation clause of the homestead act to lands in the forest reserves would tend to defeat the object of the opening of these lands to agricultural entry and would embarrass the administration of the reserves.

Now, your committee have endeavored to carry out this proposition. Some objection was made to the application of this law to the State of California and the State of Wyoming; and, therefore, those States are reserved from this motion, as I understand it.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman is mistaken in regard to the State of Wyoming. It is not excepted.

Mr. LACEY. I understood that the exception was interlined in the bill as proposed to be passed on a motion to suspend the rules. I am glad to know that the State of Wyoming is to have the benefit of this bill, because I believe it is of unquestioned advantage to that great Commonwealth. We have already passed a bill as to the Black Hills region in South Dakota. The situation there is somewhat different from what it is in any other of the forest reserves, and we thought it was well to have special legislation for the peculiar conditions existing there. This bill is believed by the Department, by the Land Commission, and also by the Public Lands Committee, in the best interest of the States where these reserves are situated, and in no wise detrimental to the reserves themselves.

I yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. HOGG. Mr. Speaker, I am very much interested in the passage of this bill, not that I think the bill is what it ought to be by any means, but it is going in a direction that ought to be gone in; and that is this: We ought to take away from the administration of forest reserves the right to include within those reserves lands that are agricultural in character. It has been the theory of the Government from the very beginning that the lands belong to the people for the purpose of settlement, for the purpose of making homes for themselves; and we find that under the operation of this forest-reserve law that more than 200,000 square miles of the territory of the United States has been taken away from possible settlement by anybody.

Now, I say that as long as this Department holds this tremendous power, a power that was never imagined was to be conferred upon the President when the law was passed, or on anybody else, when this power has been exercised to the detriment of the people of the country, when these reservations have been established, it is about time that some legislation should be had in order to force out of these forest reserves lands that are capable of being made into homes, which is the purpose of this bill, except the provision that leaves it in the discretion of the Secretary whether he will eliminate the agricultural lands or not. To that part of the bill I am opposed. I am opposed to this action by discretion in anybody whenever it is possible for Congress to pass a law that will do away with the exercise of this discretion. The fact that it gives discretion to the Secretary, whether he will eliminate these lands or not, to my mind is a bad piece of legislation. I should like to see the law go further, and when it was made apparent that lands were fit for agricultural purposes it should become the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to eliminate the lands in order that they might be settled upon by the citizens of the respective States where these large areas are taken out.

The trouble with the administration of forest reserves is that we have got at the head of the institution, of course, a man of splendid character, a man whom I respect most highly, but a theorist from beginning to end in regard to the operation of the forest reserves. Apparently they think more of a tree or a piece of sagebrush than they do of an American citizen out there. They will take in areas absolutely barren of trees and call it a forest reserve. They are attempting to plant seed out there and make timber grow, and I expect one of the first efforts will be to plant seeds above the timber line and expect results.

Why, in my district they at one time put about two-thirds of the city of Salida into the forest reserve, a city larger than any city in the territory that the gentleman on my right [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] has in his district.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. HOGG. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Was not that at the request of the inhabitants of that town that they might avoid taxation? [Laughter.]

Mr. HOGG. Oh, no; oh, no; we pay more taxes there than the gentleman from Iowa does, and don't make half the fuss about it. [Laughter.]

Now, I say I am in favor of the purpose of this bill because it is a step in the right direction. It makes it possible to get these lands, that never ought to have been put in a forest reserve, out, so that they may be subject to settlement by citizens of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eleven minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, it will be impossible for me more than briefly to express my opinions upon this measure within the limited time at my disposal. There is a thought suggested in this bill that is good, but at the same time, when the whole bill is considered, I believe it is a measure that will act as a sort of chloroform to the people of the West while the policy of establishing forest reserves is being carried out. In my State nearly one-third of the area is included within a permanent reserve or a temporary reserve. There is much land which is included in the forest reserves which is agricultural. Under the terms of this bill it is provided that instead of permitting the lands to be restored to entry by proclamation of the President alone, as may be done at present, the Secretary having charge of the forestry service may restore the agricultural land. In other words, in this respect there is little change from the existing law. You propose to give to the Secretary and to the President, acting separately, power that now belongs to the President, and, as you know, in a matter of this character, he, no doubt, would be governed in the main by the recommendation of the Secretary. For my part, I believe that the bill should be amended in the first section by providing that the Secretary having charge of the forestry service "shall" open up to entry all agricultural and grazing lands within the forest reserves, and that those lands "shall" be made available for homes for the American people. Insert the word "shall" in lieu of "may, in his discretion," and you will cover this defect in the measure. I believe that the passage of this bill will result in no good purpose, but that the people of the West, who think they are to receive some great boon, will wake up, after the forestry service shall have extended the forest reserves still further over the States of the West, and find that no boon has been given to them, but more lands have been included within reserves. They are asking for bread, and you are giving to them a stone.

I am especially opposed to this bill because it contains these words in section 1:

Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture may set aside such forest reserve lands as were not occupied by a bona fide settler January 1, 1906, when he considers them necessary for forest reserve administrative purposes, which lands so set aside shall be listed in the local land office and shall not be subject to settlement entry or location under the public-land laws during the life of the forest reserve in which they are situated, or until such lists are revoked by the Secretary.

What do those words mean? Why, under the law as it now is all public-land laws are abrogated save the mining laws alone. Under this harmless-looking provision you would also place it in the hands of the Forestry Service to abrogate the mining laws as well. I am opposed to that provision, and I have urged that it be stricken out. Friends of the measure have assured me they will accept the amendment to strike out the provision, and I hope the House will do the same.

Mr. Speaker, I believe in a policy that will guarantee the protection of the rivers, of the sources of the water for irrigation purposes, and the timber upon the areas wherever these lands can not be available for homes; but I do believe that the policy of the Government which we have followed so long should be followed now, and that every inch of land that can be made available for homes for our people should be opened to settlement as speedily as possible, whether within a reserve or not. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Speaker, I am not very deeply interested in the bill that is before the House, because California has been eliminated from it; but I think it might be worth while to correct the idea expressed by the gentleman from Colorado as to the timber feature of a forest reserve. There has been a great deal of misunderstanding throughout the country with reference to the policy of the Government, because of the name that has been given to that work. Now, as it is developing, and as the people are coming to understand it, it is not, I think, chiefly a question of forestry, but a question of grazing; and if they should change the name of it and call it a "forest and range reserve," the country would readily understand what they are trying to do. In a great deal of the western country there are mountain sides that are now and, I think, for all time will continue to be devoid of forests, and yet the fact that they are inclosed within these reserves and managed with some skill and judgment by the Government in the matter of developing the grasses and the low brush, etc., is proving very beneficial to the stock interests, and it is because in California we desire that policy continued that I asked the committee and it consented to exclude California from the operations of this bill. In my judgment, there is danger that mischief may result to the range by allowing small farms to come in that will do greater damage to the Commonwealth than if they were kept out.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Is it not a fact that this condition could only exist in California, where you have a "no fence" law?

Mr. SMITH of California. In California we have a law that the man who has the cattle must do the fencing, and therefore a person planting a little farm in a little meadow in the mountains could thereby annoy the stock range for miles round about. I believe that the condition does not prevail in Montana and some other States, and therefore it is not so important there. My purpose in speaking was chiefly to direct attention to the broader work that has been undertaken under this reserve power now placed in the hands of the Government, and I think in a few years it will be demonstrated that the benefit to the grasses and the greater amount of stock that can be carried on the range by controlling it to some extent will be a more important factor than the work of reforestation.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, the basis of the opposition of the gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH] to this bill is, in my judgment, one of the strongest arguments in its favor. The time inevitably comes in the development of the western country when the large stock range, whether it be in the interior of a forest reserve or out upon the open plain, must make way for the march of civilization, typified and represented by the settler who is seeking a small part of the public domain as an abiding place for himself and his family. So in these forest reserves the opposition to this sort of a measure that would permit agricultural settlement largely emanates (as the gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH] is free to confess is the fact in California) from large stock interests that are better served in their peculiar and particular purposes by keeping the range unto themselves than by making room for the settler. I was out of the House a few months ago when this bill came up, but I understand that the gentleman from Montana [Mr. DIXON] has proposed a couple of amendments which would eliminate the Black Hills Forest Reserve from the operation of this bill. It is true that a few days ago we passed through the House a bill exactly like this, to apply to the Black Hills Forest Reserve alone. At the same time I think the better legislation or the better results would be conserved by leaving this bill as it stands and passing it and sending it to the Senate. Then the two measures may be treated there as the necessities of the legislative situation may demand. If this bill can be passed, then the other may be abandoned. I would therefore suggest, when the time comes, that the gentleman from Montana do not insist upon the amendments that he has proposed.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Four minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to have my attitude in regard to this measure misunderstood. I am in favor of the settlement of all the agricultural public domain, and I shall vote for the bill, because it may lead to further settlement of agricultural lands. But I fear at the same time the tendency to extension of the reserves that may result from the passage of the act.

The gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH], who, I think, perhaps wisely excluded his State from the operations of the act, has referred to the inclusion of large areas of grazing lands in forest reserves.

Mr. Speaker, in my country we object to that policy. We hold that it is no part of a proper forest-reserve policy to attempt to settle range controversies or to seek to improve range conditions by the creation of forest reserves, and it is because the Department has, contrary to the spirit of the law, in many instances included large areas of grazing or agricultural lands within the reserves that there arises the necessity for this class of legislation.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of California. Was it not the original intention of the Department to so handle the public domain that it would conserve, first, the timber, and then the range—the grasses—then the water, and does not the conservation of the grasses and the small brush go a long way toward the conservation of the waters?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in the forest-reserve law that by any possibility can be tortured into permission to include grazing lands in a forest reserve with a view of improving the grass. Reserves can be established legally for two purposes only—the one the conservation of the water supply, the other the preservation of timber, largely for the purpose of the conservation of water supply—but when it comes to the inclusion of great range areas in the foothills in the sparsely timbered portions of the country in reserves, in my opinion that is a violation of both the spirit and of the letter of the law, and it is because I fear that this permission to open here and there small areas to settlement granted to the Secretary will lead him to largely increase the area of reserves that I have some doubts of the wisdom of the legislation and of its ultimate benefit.

Mr. SMITH of California. If it be a violation of the law as it now stands for them to protect the ranges, does not the gentleman think the law ought to be amended, then, to include that larger scope of the work? I think it is within the spirit of the law now.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman that whenever the Congress gets ready, if it ever does, to give to an administrative department control over the public ranges we should do that in a carefully prepared, well-digested measure and not by loose construction of legislation provided for an altogether different purpose.

Now, I hope, Mr. Speaker, that my fears are unfounded; that this legislation will not be taken as an excuse for vast increases of the area of forest reserves. It has been the policy of the Government from its foundation to gradually pass into the hands of the people all of the public domain—a wise policy, departed from in the case of the forest reserves for reasons that have seemed right and proper so far as the law is carefully followed and the reserves limited to timbered and mountainous areas, but if that policy is to be carried to the extreme of the inclusion of the greater portion of States in forest reserves and of vast areas but sparsely and partially timbered, then, in my opinion, we have departed from the established custom and policy of the country to the harm and detriment of the people.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, in conclusion, that I think everybody on the Public Lands Committee was in favor of this bill. It is not a perfect bill; it is not what any one of us individually wanted, but it was the best thing that we could get, and we sincerely hope the bill will pass.

In this connection I will say that after consultation with the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN], I would ask unanimous consent that my amendment striking out sections 3 and 4 of the bill be not considered. I would like to withdraw that amendment. That puts the South Dakota provisions back in the bill. The amendment was offered because the South Dakota bill had already passed the House; but the gentleman now states to me that it has not yet passed the Senate, and I would like to have sections 3 and 4 put back in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment striking out sections 3 and 4, and to properly renumber the sections. Is there objection?

Mr. LACEY. That would still leave in, as I understand, the committee amendments. There are three or four where one or two words are changed.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. These committee amendments ought to be in.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Yes. In order to clarify the situation I would say that this amendment I now offer will leave the bill exactly as it was with the committee amendments, only striking out lines 17 to 25 on page 3.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman asks unanimous consent to modify his motion to pass the bill as printed, with the exception of striking out lines 17 to 25 on page 3.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. That is right.

Mr. LACEY. The effect of that will be to put back the Black Hills proposition?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. It will put back the Black Hills proposition.

Mr. LACEY. So that the Senate can have both propositions all in one bill.

The SPEAKER. Then the motions stands, as the Chair understands it, to pass the bill as printed with lines 17 to 25, inclusive, page 3, stricken out?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Leaving sections 3 and 4 in the bill.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. With the committee amendments as printed in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The question is on agreeing to the amendments and passing the bill. As many as are in favor of agreeing to the amendments and passing the bill will say "aye;" those opposed, "no." [After a pause.] The "ayes" seem to have it; and, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules are suspended, and the bill is passed.

The bill as passed is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, and he is hereby authorized, upon application or otherwise, to examine and ascertain as to the location and extent of lands within permanent or temporary forest reserves, except in the State of California, which are chiefly valuable for agriculture, and which, in his opinion, may be occupied for agricultural purposes without injury to the forest reserves, and which are not needed for public purposes, and may list and describe the same by metes and bounds or otherwise, and file the lists and descriptions with the Secretary of the Interior, with the request that the said lands be opened to entry in accordance with the provisions of the homestead laws and this act.

Upon the filing of any such list or description the Secretary of the Interior shall declare the said lands open to homestead settlement and entry in tracts not exceeding 160 acres in area and not exceeding 1 mile in length, at the expiration of sixty days from the filing of the list in the land office of the district within which the lands are located, during which period the said list or description shall be prominently posted in the land office and advertised for a period of not less than four weeks in one newspaper of general circulation published in the county in which the lands are situated: Provided, That any settler actually occupying and in good faith claiming such lands for agricultural purposes prior to January 1, 1906, and who shall not have abandoned the same, and the person, if qualified to make a homestead entry, upon whose application the land proposed to be entered was examined and listed, shall, each in the order named, have a preference right of settlement and entry: Provided further, That any entryman desiring to obtain patent to any lands described by metes and bounds entered by him under the provisions of this act shall, within five years of the date of making settlement, file, with the required proof of residence and cultivation, a plat and field notes of the lands entered, made by or under the direction of the United States surveyor-general, showing accurately the boundaries of such lands, which shall be distinctly marked by monuments on the ground, and by posting a copy of such plat, together with a notice of the time and place of offering proof, in a conspicuous place on the land embraced in such plat during the period prescribed by law for the publication of his notice of intention to offer proof, and that a copy of such plat and field notes shall also be kept posted in the office of the register of the land office for the land district in which such lands are situated for a like period; and further, that any agricultural lands within forest reserves may, at the discretion of the Secretary, be surveyed by metes and bounds, and that no lands entered under the provisions of this act shall be patented under the commutation provisions of the homestead laws, but settlers, upon final proof, shall have credit for the period of their actual residence upon the lands covered by their entries.

SEC. 2. That settlers upon lands chiefly valuable for agriculture within forest reserves on January 1, 1906, who have already exercised or lost their homestead privilege, but are otherwise competent to enter lands under the homestead laws, are hereby granted an additional homestead right of entry for the purposes of this act only, and such settlers must otherwise comply with the provisions of the homestead law, and in addition thereto must pay $2.50 per acre for lands entered under the provisions of this section, such payment to be made at the time of making final proof on such lands.

SEC. 3. That all entries under this act in the Black Hills Forest Reserve shall be subject to the quartz or lode mining laws of the United States, and the laws and regulations permitting the location, appropriation, and use of the waters within the said forest reserves for mining, irrigation, and other purposes; and no titles acquired to agricultural lands in said Black Hills Forest Reserve under this act shall vest in the patentee any riparian rights to any stream or streams of flowing water within said reserve; and that such limitation of title shall be expressed in the patents for the lands covered by such entries.

SEC. 4. That no homestead settlements or entries shall be allowed in that portion of the Black Hills Forest Reserve in Lawrence and Pennington counties in South Dakota except to persons occupying lands therein prior to January 1, 1906, and the provisions of this act shall apply to the said counties in said reserve only so far as is necessary to give and perfect title of such settlers or occupants to lands chiefly valuable for agriculture therein occupied or claimed by them prior to the said date, and all homestead entries under this act in said counties in said reserve shall be described by metes and bounds survey.

SEC. 5. That nothing herein contained shall be held to authorize any future settlement on any lands within forest reserves until such lands have been opened to settlement as provided in this act, or to in any way impair the legal rights of any bona fide homestead settler who has or shall establish residence upon public lands prior to their inclusion within a forest reserve.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE OPERATIONS OF THE RECLAMATION ACT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the following bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17833) providing for the administration of the operations of the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act.

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be in the Department of the Interior a director of the Reclamation Service, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be entitled to a salary of $6,000 a year, to be paid from the reclamation fund.

SEC. 2. That under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior the director of the Reclamation Service shall make examinations and surveys for and locate and construct, operate and maintain irrigation or reclamation works for the storage, diversion, and development of waters, including artesian wells, as provided in the act of June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act, and any act amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto.

SEC. 3. That immediately after the close of each fiscal year the Secretary of the Interior shall prepare and submit to Congress a report covering the fiscal year just closed of all operations and expenditures under the reclamation act, the results of all examinations and surveys, the condition of each project proposed and undertaken, the quantity and location of lands which can be irrigated from each, estimates of cost of all works contemplated or under construction; also detailed report of expenditures of each and every kind on each project under construction and total of expenditures on such project; also all returns and reimbursements to the reclamation fund; also a statement of all employees of the Reclamation Service, other than laborers, giving their names, salaries, and where employed; also all expenditures in the acquisition of lands, canals, or other property, and all other information that may be necessary to inform Congress as to all the operations under the law. And in order that said report may be in print for the information of Congress at the beginning of each regular session thereof the Secretary of the Interior, as soon as said report is completed, is hereby authorized to transmit the same to the Public Printer with the statement that the usual number of copies is required, and the Public Printer is hereby directed to print the same.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior shall submit in the Annual Book of Estimates, under the head of Irrigation of Arid Lands, a statement of the amounts proposed to be expended during the succeeding year, under the provisions of the reclamation act, for examinations and surveys, for construction, for operation and maintenance, and for general expenses; also the number of persons employed in the Reclamation Service in the city of Washington and elsewhere and the rate of compensation paid to each during the fiscal year next preceding the fiscal year for which estimates are submitted, excluding temporary employees and laborers. The expenditures made in pursuance of such estimates shall be dependent upon conditions of practicability, as developed by the surveys and investigations and upon compliance with the provisions of the said reclamation act and of any act amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto.

SEC. 5. That until the President appoints a director of the Reclamation Service, as provided herein, the duties of said office shall be performed by the Director of the Geological Survey, who shall receive for such services, in addition to any other official salary he may be receiving, a sum not to exceed $1,500, to be determined by the President and paid from the reclamation fund, said additional sum to be paid to said Director notwithstanding section 1765 of the Revised Statutes or section 3 of the act of June 20, 1874, chapter 328.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Wyoming is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from California is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve my time.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I am necessarily opposed to this bill, but this is the first time I have heard of it, and I would like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming some questions.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman desires it, I will make a brief statement at this time of what the bill proposes.

Mr. NEEDHAM. I will ask some questions, if the gentleman will permit. Is this a complete reorganization of the Reclamation Service?

Mr. MONDELL. Not at all.

Mr. NEEDHAM. What is the object of the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I will make a statement, if the gentleman desires, in my own time.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Then I reserve the balance of my time for the purpose of allowing the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, by the terms of the reclamation act the duties and responsibilities under that act were placed upon the Secretary of the Interior. In carrying out the work contemplated under the act the Secretary designated the Director of the Geological Survey as the officer to supervise and direct the same, and Mr. Newell, Chief of the Hydrographic Division of the Geological Survey, under the title of chief engineer, has had personal charge of the work and the field and office force now known as the "Reclamation Service." Under this plan of organization the work has gone on in a very satisfactory way.

There is no thought or intention of changing in any way the personnel of the Reclamation Service, but in the consideration of matters connected with this work it has been deemed wise to have the officer who under the Secretary is charged with the duty of the details of examinations, surveys, and construction, an officer appointed by the President, designated by him to the end that the status of the Service may be thus permanently fixed. The first section of the bill provides for this officer, at a salary of $6,000 a year, to be appointed by the President and under the Secretary to perform the duties required under the reclamation act.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me? Is that the office now filled by Mr. Newell at the head of the Reclamation Service?

Mr. MONDELL. It is the office now filled by Mr. Walcott, Director of the Geological Survey, under whom Mr. Newell is the chief engineer and the man in direct charge.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the new officer proposed to be created by this bill be an engineer and also have superintendence of the entire irrigation work?

Mr. MONDELL. There is nothing contained in the bill with regard to the character of the training of the officer who is to be appointed, the committee assuming that the President, fully understanding all the requirements of the Service, will appoint a man qualified to perform the duties imposed upon him, and the last section of the bill provides that, until the President shall appoint, the Director of the Geological Survey shall continue to be the Director of the Reclamation Service.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, does this create a new office?

Mr. PALMER. The long and short of this business is to create a new office at $6,000 to do the work that is perfectly satisfactorily done now by an officer already in existence. That is the logic of it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is what I understand.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me, this bill does create a new office. It provides, however, for no additional expenditure whatever.

Mr. PALMER. Does he not get a salary of $6,000 a year?

Mr. MONDELL. But the gentleman who is now performing the duties receives a salary of $6,000 a year.

Mr. PALMER. That is, the Director of the Geological Survey receives a salary of $6,000, and for that he does all of this other business? That is, he performs all of the duties of his own office?

Mr. MONDELL. This bill does provide in the last section that as long as this particular officer shall perform these duties he shall receive an additional honorarium of $1,500. That is the only increased charge on the Treasury in the bill.

Mr. PALMER. Will not the Director of the Geological Survey get his salary just the same whether this bill passes or whether it does not pass?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, if this bill passes he will continue to draw $6,000 as Director of the Geological Survey, in addition to which he will draw $1,500 as Director of the Reclamation Service.

Mr. PALMER. Very well. Now, when your new officer is appointed he will get another $6,000?

Mr. MONDELL. He will get $6,000 and no more.

Mr. PALMER. Then the point I make is this: That this creates a new office to be paid for at $6,000, to perform duty which, according to your own statement, are now perfectly satisfactorily performed at a cost of $1,500 a year?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I made no such statement, and the gentleman is mistaken as to the facts. It is true that at this time this additional work is placed upon an officer who already has large responsibilities. The President in all probability will not at this time deem it wise to appoint another officer to this position. Mr. Walcott is performing all his duties in a most satisfactory manner, and the committee believed, after very careful consideration, that so long as this officer does perform this additional duty he is entitled to something in addition to his regular salary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is the object of this bill to create a new office at $6,000 a year or to provide $1,500 additional for the man who is now doing the work? Which is the particular thing that this bill is really intended to accomplish?

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman that this bill was reported by one of the committees of this House——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not ask the gentleman——

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). In the performance of its duty as a servant of this House, with a view of carrying on to the very best advantage the very important work under the Reclamation Service, and it was not drawn with a view of giving anyone an office or an additional salary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will repeat my question, if the gentleman will permit me, because it is evident he did not understand it. Is the object of this bill to create a new office at a salary of $6,000 a year, or only to increase the compensation of a man who is now getting $6,000 a year?

Mr. MONDELL. If I did not answer the gentleman understandingly, I will put it in another way, and say that the bill provides in its first section that a director of the Reclamation Service shall be appointed by the President, at a salary of $6,000 a year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman intend that the man shall be appointed or not? Is it intended that that man shall be appointed?

Mr. MONDELL. It is intended that that man shall be appointed whenever in the wisdom of the President or in his judgment such officer should be appointed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, does the gentleman from Wyoming believe that we should leave that to the discretion of the President or that we should exercise that discretion ourselves, and if the office is necessary, create it, and if it be unnecessary, refuse to create it?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I will say to the gentleman that the committee, after very carefully considering all of the conditions surrounding this work, believed it would be wise to have an officer appointed by the President in charge of the reclamation work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is such an officer now, is there not?

Mr. MONDELL. The committee also believed that at the present time the work was being carried on in a very satisfactory way; that there was no necessity for a change, but no one knows how long the present Director of the Geological Survey may continue in that office. We hope that he will continue for a long time, for he is a very faithful public officer, but he may be transferred to other spheres of usefulness or he might resign. Men sometimes do that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Never, in this Government. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. And should any of these contingencies occur the President is then expected to appoint. In the meantime the work has been satisfactorily done. But the committee believe that work of such importance, entailing so much additional labor and attention and responsibility, entitled the officer doing the work to additional compensation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the work is being done, and satisfactorily performed at this time, by an officer appointed by the President, will it make that officer any more efficient to increase his salary; or is it a fact, as the gentleman stated it at one time, that he was overworked and could not perform the duties, and perhaps might be able if he got the additional money? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I do not recall having stated that the gentleman was overworked and could not perform the duty. The gentleman from New York misunderstands the situation, because the Director of the Reclamation Service is not, as such, at this time an officer appointed by the President. He is an officer designated by the Secretary; and I want to call attention of the gentleman to the fact that that is a feature of the situation we desire to remedy. We wish to fix the status of the Reclamation Service by having at the head of it under the Secretary an officer whose status is fixed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman think it will make any difference as to the efficiency with which this work is performed whether the man is appointed by the President or designated by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I do not claim that it would necessarily make a difference.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Incidentally?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know that it would make any difference necessarily whether the gentleman from New York represented a district in New York or a district west of the Mississippi; he would represent it——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Equally well; I concede that. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman if there has been any request on the part of the President or the Secretary of the Interior or the Director of the Geological Survey for the appointment of this new officer?

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman this proposed legislation has been called to the attention of the President, the Secretary, and the officers of the Reclamation Service, and all of these, as I understand it, think it would be wise to have legislation along the general lines of this bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. To appoint a new officer or increase the salary of the old one?

Mr. MONDELL. The important feature of this measure is that it makes the Director of the Reclamation Service an appointee of the President and permanently fixes the status of the service in the Interior Department.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is he not now? Is not the Chief of the Geological Survey an appointee of the President?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the Chief of the Geological Survey is a Presidential appointee. The duty he performs as Chief of the Reclamation Service, and which is imposed on him by direction of the Secretary of the Interior in addition——

Mr. HEPBURN. It will be the same with this officer, will it not? He will be subordinate to the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. MONDELL. He will.

Mr. HEPBURN. So that there is no difference at all in that respect?

Mr. MONDELL. Except in one case we have an officer appointed by the President.

Mr. HEPBURN. Another matter. Is it not true that many of the subordinates in the Geological Survey are officers of the Geological Survey, employees that belong to that branch of the Government?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. HEPBURN. Very many of the subordinates under the Director of the Geological Survey and engaged in the reclamation work are officers under the Director of the Geological Survey as it now exists?

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman that the nucleus of the Reclamation Service was the Hydrographic Division of the Geological Survey. In other words, by a letter the Secretary placed the duties and responsibilities of directing the work under the reclamation act upon the Director of the Geological Survey, and he designated the head of the Hydrographic Division in that Bureau, Mr. Newell, as the officer to have direct charge of the work. But the officers of that division who took up the reclamation work ceased to be officers on the rolls of the Geological Survey, and became officers on the rolls of the Reclamation Service.

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, what will be their status? Where would the new officer secure his subordinates if this bill became law?

Mr. MONDELL. There would be no change from the present situation whatever by the passage of this act as regards the subordinates, the personnel of the Reclamation Service.

How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. NEEDHAM. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this bill has five sections; three of them seem to be intended to accomplish something beneficial, the other two—and the peculiar thing is they are the first and the last—require considerable explanation. If I can summarize the statement of the gentleman from Wyoming, it is to this effect: That there is a gentleman to-day performing very efficiently the duties of the head of the Reclamation Service, in addition to some other work. He is now receiving $6,000 a year. Somebody fears that in some unusual and unforseen way this gentleman may become separated from the service, and in order to provide against that contingency it is desired to have available a $6,000 place for the President to fill. Well, I hardly believe that even the most ardent admirer of the President would ever suggest that he would defer the filling of that $6,000 place until something occurred in connection with another man holding some other position. This other gentleman, who is occupying at present a position at the head of a bureau, is performing the work of the Reclamation Service in an entirely satisfactory manner. He is one of the highest paid officers in the Government. He receives $6,000 a year. But because some additional work is imposed upon him it is proposed to give him $1,500 additional. If he be overworked, this work should not be placed on him. If he is not overworked, and if he is performing the work satisfactorily, there is hardly any excuse whatever for increasing his salary. Now, there may be some other good reason for these two sections of the bill, and the gentleman from Wyoming suggests that there is one, and that is if instead of being designated by the Secretary of the Interior the head of the Reclamation Service is appointed by the President that the work will be much more satisfactorily performed. That hardly appeals to anyone who considers it for a moment, because, as a matter of fact, the present head of the Reclamation Service has been designated or assigned to that work by the Secretary of the Interior, and the gentleman from Wyoming himself admits that the work is being performed in a manner that is satisfactory to everybody interested in this great work.

If the only reason for this bill is either to provide an additional place at $6,000 a year, or to increase the compensation of a man who is performing his work satisfactorily, and so far as we know without any complaint against the salary he is now receiving, to increase his compensation by $1,500 a year, there seems to be hardly any excuse to occupy the time of this House with a bill of such a character, and unless the gentleman in charge of the bill can give some more satisfactory explanation than has been given, I hope the House will not pass the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I should like to suggest to the gentleman from New York that the work that is being carried on in the Reclamation Service is a very important work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is conceded.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. And that they are expending annually a very large sum of money; and while the conditions up to this time have been very satisfactory, yet there is no assurance that those conditions will continue permanently.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me just to finish my statement, I will say that there is no apparent danger, so far as anybody can ascertain, that the work will not be efficiently carried on, or that the head of this service will separate himself from the service, unless it is in the contemplation of the appointing power to supplant him when his term expires.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REEDER].

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Speaker, there is a purpose, as there should be for every bill, for the introduction of this bill in the House. There is a double purpose. The first purpose is that in this immense expenditure of the public money an accounting should be had, annually at least, and this is provided for in sections 2, 3, and 4 of this bill, and is conceded by all to be a good proposition.

When we were considering this matter we found that the irrigation bill, as passed in 1902, provided that the Secretary of the Interior was empowered to appoint persons to take charge of this work. The Secretary of the Interior did appoint the head of the Geological Survey for this purpose, which was and is satisfactory. But it also left the matter in such shape that he might at any time, or any new Secretary of the Interior might at any time, appoint some other branch of the Government to take charge of this work, which the committee thought not a desirable power to so lodge. For instance, the Secretary of the Interior might conclude this afternoon that he would put this work in charge of the Agricultural Department, and the committee desires it to remain permanently with the Geological Survey.

Mr. MAHON. Then your purpose is to give this department a legal status. Is that the purpose—to fix it by law?

Mr. REEDER. Our purpose is to have this immense work continued under the supervision which now has it in charge.

Mr. MAHON. To give it a legal status, so that it can not be disturbed by any Department officer.

Mr. REEDER. Our purpose was to give this a permanent status, and where it has been doing such satisfactory work.

Mr. PALMER. How can an appointment of another officer improve the local status?

Mr. REEDER. That is not the question under discussion at this time. The purpose of the bill is to do two things, and I have indicated what they are. Now I will state why we established a new office. We found here a great undertaking, growing very rapidly in importance and in the labor required. We found that it was now exceedingly difficult for the head of the Geological Survey to do this increased work. Here is a work that is extending all over the western half of the United States. It is a work of great importance, and it is a work that will be continued for a great many years in the future. The time will come when it will require as good a man at the head of this work, if it does not already, as it does at the head of the Panama Canal Commission or any other work that has ever been undertaken in the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. If it was the intention of the committee to separate this service into a separate bureau, why do you provide for the increase of salary during its continuance under the charge of the Director of the Geological Survey?

Mr. REEDER. We concluded that this man was a man of sufficient ability to take charge of this work, in its present state at least, and a man of such ability, worked as he necessarily will be to take care of this great enterprise in a proper manner in addition to his already responsible work, was getting too small a salary in our judgment. As long as he is continued in that place with the work he has on hand, he will certainly be a man that is worked more than the head of many, if not any, other Department in this Government. We felt that he was entitled to the $1,500 extra salary. If the objection that gentlemen have to this bill is this extra salary, they can strike it out, but we feel it would be a great injustice to do so.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman knows that we can not strike out a provision by an amendment under a motion of this kind.

Mr. REEDER. I hope you can not.

Mr. PALMER. Then what does the gentleman mean by putting up this bluff? [Laughter.]

Mr. REEDER. This information I have just received. If the information is correct, I would not change it if I could, because I do not wish this increase of salary stricken out.

Mr. CURTIS. Let me ask the gentleman if he thinks that it is right to pay this gentleman a larger salary than is paid to officers who are his superiors?

Mr. MONDELL. We do that in the Panama Canal.

Mr. REEDER. An engineer competent to take charge of this work is worth more than $7,500 a year for the Panama Canal or equally great private undertaking.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, my objection to the bill is that it does not go far enough. When we passed the reclamation act we gave the Secretary of the Interior all the receipts from the sales of public lands—created it as a fund and gave it to him—and since that he has been using it without any direction or authority of Congress whatever. I freely concede he has used it thus far wisely, but I think it is a bad precedent to put in the hands of one executive officer so vast a sum and give it to him without any restriction as to his power to expend it.

I regret that this bill does not go into a detailed organization of the reclamation branch of the Service. It seems to me that it is proper and wise, for the benefit of the Service itself, that its action should be restricted by some statute law. As it is now, the Secretary of the Interior, as I understand it, has the authority, without any restriction whatever, to expend this vast sum. Therefore it seems to me when this committee was taking up this proposition it should have gone into the subject in detail and provided for certain officers and fixed their salaries, so there would have been an organization of this branch of the Service authorized by Congress itself and which would be accountable to Congress. As it is now, the Secretary of the Interior fixes the salary of every one of the employees in the Reclamation Service. There is absolutely no restriction on his power to fix salaries.

Mr. PALMER. As I understand, the Service is perfectly satisfactory; that there has been no abuse of power. All you are trying to do is to anticipate the time when the Chief of the Geological Survey may depart this life or be promoted to some other sphere of usefulness?

Mr. REEDER. Will the gentleman from California allow me to answer that question?

Mr. NEEDHAM. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. REEDER. I would like to say that it was being so well conducted that we wanted to locate it permanently in this Department.

Mr. PALMER. How are you going to improve the conduct of the office by appointing a new man to administer it at $6,000 a year and when, as you say, it is now being conducted in a perfectly satisfactory manner?

Mr. REEDER. The purpose was to locate this work where it now is.

Mr. PALMER. It is located here in Washington.

Mr. REEDER. It is located with the head of the Geological Survey.

Mr. PALMER. Yes; but the bill provides that he is to get $1,500 extra until the President chooses to appoint somebody else.

Mr. REEDER. The bill provides that it shall be located permanently with persons now looking after it and can not be transferred to some other Department. That is the purpose of sections 1 and 5 of the bill.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that in the interest of good administration the duties of the officials of the Reclamation Service should be defined and their salaries fixed by Congress. That is the reason why, it seems to me, this bill is objectionable—it does not go far enough. It simply fixes the salary of one official of the Reclamation Service. I do not care how honest these officials may be, and I concede they are honest and that they have done good work—I have no criticism of the Reclamation Service—but it is due to the Service itself that there should be some organization of that branch of the Government, that Congress should state what should be the salaries and what offices should be created. Therefore I regret that this committee, when they took up this question, did not go into it thoroughly and report a bill dealing with the whole question generally, so that every official in this Service might have his duties defined and his salary fixed.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if he has observed that this bill does provide that the committee shall know of every man that is employed and what his salary is, and not only what has been paid in the year past, but the estimated salaries, so that we may know what is being done.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Yes; but still the salaries are fixed by the executive department. There is only one salary fixed in this bill. Therefore it seems to me that Congress should fix the salaries of all officials and not permit an executive officer to fix the compensation of any official. I shall not oppose this bill, Mr. Speaker, for I believe it to be a step in the right direction, and I hope the gentlemen of the committee will go on and thoroughly organize and perfect this branch of the Government.

I now yield the balance of my time, four minutes, to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania rose.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman proceeds I would like to ask him a question, so that he may answer it in the course of his remarks.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. SMITH of California. Is it contemplated by this bill that sooner or later some one shall be appointed who will be over Mr. Newell—that is, over the station which he now holds—that the "chief engineer," as we now call him, would act under the direction of some additional person, or is it contemplated that this position created here shall be the same as that now held by Mr. Newell in relation to the other departments of the Reclamation Service?

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I don't know whether I understand the purpose of the gentleman in the question or not. If he means to say that the work is being carried on by Mr. Newell at this time, he is in error, because the work is under the charge of the Director of the Geological Survey, Mr. Walcott. Mr. Newell is the chief engineer under him.

Mr. SMITH of California. Does not the description of the work to be done by this new office correspond to the work being done by Mr. Newell?

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I would answer that question by saying that it is not the purpose of this bill to change the personnel or to change this organization at all. It is the purpose of this bill to give the Reclamation Service a fixed legal status. As it is at present, it exists, as has been stated by the chairman of our committee, by a letter from the Secretary of the Interior designating the head of the Geological Survey to do this work. He could change that order to-day. The whole force could be disorganized, and the good work that has been going on here might be so interrupted as to result in very serious consequences to what is being done; but, Mr. Speaker, this bill, I think, is in the right direction. It is in the interests of good administration. We propose that the work here, which is so important and which is growing so rapidly and attracting so much of the attention of the people who live in that section of the country, shall be administered in a way that will be above criticism, and to that end we have inserted in this bill a section which provides that estimates or statements shall be submitted to Congress, so that Congress may be in the possession of knowledge in advance of the work that is being done or is proposed to be done, and we also insert in the bill a clause which requires the making public of this annual report in such manner as that it will be available at the beginning of Congress, so that Members can see what is being done. Under these provisions we think that we have taken a step in the right direction. It is not the purpose to reform this Bureau and change its organization, but it is the purpose to perpetuate it and give it a fixed legal status, and in case a change is necessary, as will be necessary in the course of time, the President, as the high appointing power of this Government, can designate some proper person who will take charge of the work and administer it in a way that will be satisfactory to the people of this country.

The extent of the work that is being carried on there is not known perhaps to many people. It is estimated that during the present fiscal year there will be expended in this work something like $12,000,000, a larger sum than that which is being expended under the direction of the President on the Panama Canal, which has created so much talk and discussion in this House. It is the purpose of this bill that we shall have more advanced knowledge of what is proposed to be done with this large sum of money.

Mr. PALMER. Have you got any well-grounded apprehension the Secretary of the Interior is about to make a change and transfer this work to the Agricultural Department?

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I do not say there is, and I do not think that is a necessary inference from this bill, but I think it is proper and wise that we take such steps in this reclamation work here as will make sufficient provision for the future. It is not necessary to wait until the damage in done or something happens in order to find some justification for it.

Mr. PALMER. The good book says, "Sufficient to the day is the evil thereof."

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. But we do not want to wait for the evil day; we want to make provision for the evil day before it arrives.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the bill is not only legislation in the right direction, but that it goes quite far enough for the present at least. The Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands of the House has taken great pains to keep in close touch with the work of the Reclamation Service. We have found that work to have been carried on in a faithful, energetic, economical, satisfactory manner. We believe that the Bureau now established by the direction of the Secretary of the Interior should be permanently fixed by law. This bill provides no further expenditure than might now be made under the reclamation act. In addition——

Mr. SMITH of California. I think, in looking at the bill a little closer, it aims more at the position now held by the head of the Geological Survey than the chief engineer, to whom I referred in addressing the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Now, does it contemplate the Director of the Geological Survey shall be separated from the duties of the Reclamation Service, or will he be put under this new director, or what will be the relations between the director of this Service and the Director of the Geological Survey?

Mr. MONDELL. You mean the Chief of the Reclamation Service?

Mr. SMITH of California. This office that is created. What will be its relation to the Director of the Geological Survey, or rather what will be the relation of the Director of the Geological Survey to the Reclamation Service?

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman there will be no change whatever by reason of this legislation in the relations now existing between Mr. Newell and Mr. Walcott. Mr. Walcott is now in charge of the Reclamation Service by order of the Secretary, and Mr. Newell is under Mr. Walcott as chief engineer.

Mr. SMITH of California. Now, suppose the President should appoint a man to take the position herein created?

Mr. MONDELL. He will take the position now occupied by Mr. Wolcott.

Mr. SMITH of California. And Mr. Wolcott would have nothing to do with the Reclamation Service.

Mr. MONDELL. Not at all. Now, Mr. Speaker, in addition to fixing the status of the service the bill provides for an enlarged report to Congress in great detail of all operations of the Reclamation Service, which the committee believes to be wise. It provides for the submission of a statement in the Annual Book of Estimates of the estimated expenditures for the year following, and it provides that at the present time and until the President appoints or makes a change there will be no change whatever in the present exceedingly satisfactory personnel of the Reclamation Service.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HEPBURN) there were—ayes 75, noes 19.

So, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

Permits for the construction of each of the foregoing power plants having been heretofore granted by the Interior or Agricultural Departments.

SEC. 2. That the ground covered by the permit hereby granted shall include 50 feet on each side of the center of said canals or conduit lines and on each side of said pole lines, or so much thereof as may be actually necessary for their installation, maintenance, and use, and the ground actually occupied by and necessary for power houses, diverting dams, and necessary buildings and structures to be used in connection with the operation and maintenance of said water-power plants, together with 50 feet on each side of the marginal limits of all of such buildings and structures, or such portion of said 50 feet as may be actually necessary for the efficient operation and maintenance of said power plants, dams, and other structures; also the right to submerge and flood at the intake of each of said power plants within said forest reserves, not to exceed 30 acres in each case, such area only as may be actually necessary to divert the water into the several canal or conduit lines for said several power plants.

SEC. 3. That within six months after the passage of this act the Edison Electric Company shall file with the register of the United States land office for the district where said power plants are located, and with the Forester of the Department of Agriculture, a map, showing separately as to each power plant the grounds occupied or proposed to be occupied by such canals or conduit lines, pole lines, power houses, and other buildings and structures used in connection with said electrical power plants. These maps shall show the dimensions of each building and structure and each diverting dam, and the areas which it will be necessary to submerge at the point of intake of each power plant and, after the filing of said maps, all lands covered by this permit as shown on the maps, or to be occupied by such buildings and structures as shown, together with such portion of 50 feet on each side of the marginal limits thereof as may be actually necessary for the operation of the power plants, and such land as may be submerged by the construction and operation of said power plants, shall, when disposed of by the Government, be disposed of subject to the rights hereby granted unless said rights shall have terminated or shall have been revoked as herein provided prior to such disposal.

SEC. 4. That said company shall conform to all regulations adopted or prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of the Interior governing said forest reserves, or the use or the users thereof, and shall not take, cut, or destroy any timber within the forest reserves except such as it may be actually necessary to remove to construct its power plants and the structures pertaining thereto, and it shall be required to pay to the proper officer of the Forest Service the full value of all timber and wood cut, used, or destroyed by it within the forest reserves.

SEC. 5. That the privileges herein granted shall not be construed to interfere with the control of water for irrigation and other purposes under laws of the United States or of the State of California.

SEC. 6. That no private right, title, or interest owned by any person, persons, or corporation in such forest reserves shall be interfered with or abridged, except with the consent of the owner or owners, or by due process of law and just compensation to said owner or owners.

SEC. 7. That if the said permittee shall fail to consummate and put in operation the said power plant specified in subdivision (f) of section 1 hereof within two years from the date of the passage of this act, or the power plant specified in subdivision (g) of section 1 hereof within five years from the passage of this act; or the power plant specified in subdivision (h) hereof within eight years from the passage of this act; or the power plant specified in subdivision (i) of said section 1 within ten years from the passage of this act; then as to each of said power plants not completed and put in operation within the time herein limited this permit shall be deemed to be revoked without judicial or other proceeding; and a failure during any year after completion to operate any power plant provided for in this act for a total time of ninety days in such year shall operate as a like revocation of this permit as to such plant or plants.

SEC. 8. That the enjoyment of the permit hereby granted shall be subject at all times to all laws relating to the forest reserves, and to all rules and regulations authorized and established thereunder, and that for infraction of such laws, rules, or regulations the owner or user of said permit shall be subject to all fines and penalties imposed thereby, and shall also be liable in a civil action for all damages that may accrue from such breach, and that for any continued infraction of such laws, rules, or regulations, or failure to pay any amount due the Forest Service from said company within sixty days of notice thereof, the Secretary of the Department of Agriculture or other department having control of forest reserves may, after due notice and hearing, revoke and vacate this permit: Provided, That the transfer of any lands from the jurisdiction of one department to that of another shall in no wise affect this permit, but the power hereby vested in the Secretary shall, upon such transfer, be deemed to be transferred with the land.

SEC. 9. That the said company shall pay annually in advance to the proper officer of the Forest Service, as compensation for the privileges hereby granted, such reasonable sum as the Secretary of Agriculture may fix from year to year, and shall pay for wood or timber cut, removed, or destroyed as fast as the value thereof may be ascertained and charged by the Forester: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, his agents and employees, and all officers of the Forest Service, shall have free and unrestricted access in, through, and across all lands and structures covered by said permit in the performance of their official duties, and the Secretary in charge of forest reserves may construct or permit to be constructed in, through, or across any land covered by said permit, but not covered by dams, diversion works, power houses, or other buildings and roads or trails, public or otherwise, or other means of transportation, not inconsistent with the enjoyment of the permit hereby granted: Provided further, That the Edison Electric Company shall, under penalty of immediate forfeiture of the permit hereby granted, when requested to do so, assist the forest officers in fighting fire, and shall furnish any men under its employ necessary for that purpose, and shall otherwise assist to the extent of its power in protecting the forest reserves and maintaining good order upon them.

"SEC. 10. Congress shall have power at any time to amend, modify, or repeal this act."

Mr. SMITH of California (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk omit the reading of subdivisions (a) and (i) in the bill. It is merely a technical description of the quarter sections.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER (after the reading of the bill). Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask some gentleman in charge of the bill a question in order to get a little information in regard to this matter. As I understand it, these people have had revocable license to use this power up to the present time, and having expended some several million dollars on it, and now what they desire is a title in fee to it?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. That is not to be revoked unless they fail to comply with the terms of the bill? Now, I say that there is a little clause that looks as though there might be some compensation to the United States for the use of this most valuable grant of water power in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, and, of course, as those things go, the United States generally gets the little end of it. What is the occasion for giving them a title in fee, what better off will the United States be by giving that to them, instead of the revocable license which they have now?

Mr. SMITH of California. I will be very glad to explain to the gentleman. I will state that at the present time five of these electric plants are completed and in operation, furnishing power to Los Angeles and the country roundabout for all kinds of power purposes, including the light for villages, and somewhat to the city of Los Angeles. The sixth plant is in my own county, now about completed, for transmission of power to Los Angeles also. Three other plants are yet to be completed.

Now, the point comes to this: The gentleman understands that this right of way we ask is entirely over forest reserves, and in the law creating forest reserves it was provided that the Secretary of Agriculture might give a license for right of way for power purposes. Congress had already previously provided a procedure by which you could get right of way for a railroad, for an irrigating ditch, and for a mining ditch, but has never given a right of way or a procedure by which you could obtain a right of way for a water conduit line for power purposes or pole line across the country. In endeavoring to give the Secretary of Agriculture the right to grant these rights of way for power purposes, it contained this provision, that the grant given by the Secretary of Agriculture "shall not be held to confer any right or easement or interest in, to, or over any public land, reservation, or park." Thereby, if a person came along and located a mining claim—which still may be located in forest reserves—the mining right of the locator was superior to the right of the electric company, and, although they might have spent millions of dollars, as they have in some cases, in the construction of their conduit lines along the side of the mountains and in other ways, a person could come along and locate a quartz mining claim and tell them to get off, because, under the language of the statute that I have read, the right which the electric company took was not construed to be a right in or easement over the land.

Mr. PAYNE. The right of way to convey the power is a very small incident to this grant. The real thing is the water power, is it not?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes; the water right; but the water right—the right to use the water—is derived from the State——

Mr. PAYNE. Does not the United States own the sites of these dams and the reservations?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. Then the real thing is giving the water—the water power—but not the right of way for the electric wire.

Mr. SMITH of California. Do you understand that they have the right to the water under the law of California?

Mr. PAYNE. The right of way to the electric wire across the public lands would not avail the company much unless they used it for the water purposes, so that the real gift is the water and the use of it.

Mr. SMITH of California. No; because the right to the use of water in California under the law of appropriation is different. This is not on a navigable stream.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman admit that we own the reservation on which the streams and dams are located?

Mr. SMITH of California. There are not any extensive dams.

Mr. PAYNE. Do we not own the land?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes; the United States owns the land we want to use.

Mr. PAYNE. And we own the land on which the water is?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. And on which the water power is located?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. And Congress gave them the right which they have now to use that water?

Mr. SMITH of California. No, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. On a revocable license?

Mr. SMITH of California. No, sir; Congress does not give them the right to the use of the water. They get that under the law of California, by an appropriation.

Mr. PAYNE. Do you mean to say that the State of California can give land of the United States to establish water rights through them, though we own them?

Mr. SMITH of California. The water right.

Mr. GILLETT of California. I desire to say to the gentleman from New York that the laws of California are different from the laws under the common law for the use of water. They were made so by reason of the necessity for taking water for the purposes of mining, irrigation, and matters of that kind. Under the laws of California a person has the right to go upon the public domain and appropriate the water running in a stream if not already appropriated, and may do so by posting a notice stating that he intended to take so many inches of water therefrom and proposed to divert it for a certain use. Our law reads different from the common law. I want to say that when I first went to California it was a long time before I could get through my mind the right of a man to take water that would, if untouched, run through another man's land.

Mr. PAYNE. How do they get it from the United States?

Mr. GILLETT of California (continuing). It was so different from what I had known in the East. Under our laws the United States has no right in streams except it be the riparian proprietor or a navigable stream, and under the laws of California, both as to the land of the United States and of individuals, the common-law right to use water does not obtain. You can not measure the rights of the people back there as you can in Pennsylvania, because conditions are entirely different.

Mr. PAYNE. That would not give the right of another man to go on a man's land and take water?

Mr. GILLETT of California. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. And use it?

Mr. GILLETT of California. Yes, sir. Of course he would have to comply with the statute, but he would have the right to divert the water.

Mr. PAYNE. He would have to condemn it?

Mr. GILLETT of California. He would have to condemn it—yes—if the party had certain rights in the water.

Mr. PAYNE. If the man owned the land that the water was on he would have to condemn it, wouldn't he?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Water companies have the power of eminent domain.

Mr. GILLETT of California. As far as the water is concerned which flows down the sides of the Sierra Nevadas, through the lands belonging to the United States or through lands belonging to the State, people who desire it for irrigating or for domestic uses in cities, or for mining purposes, have a right to divert it by giving the proper notice and recording it in the recorder's office and commencing work within sixty days. They may take it as far as they want to take it.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Without compensation?

Mr. GILLETT of California. Without compensation; and I have seen places there in communities where certain individuals had all the water, to the exclusion of everybody else.

Mr. PAYNE. Never mind the example. Is that the condition?

The SPEAKER. One moment. This is suspension day, and the Chair desires to know if there is objection to considering this bill by unanimous consent.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to ask one more question, to determine whether I will object or not.

The SPEAKER. What the Chair wanted was to recognize the gentleman to move to suspend the rules and let the twenty minutes be running.

Mr. PAYNE. It may not be necessary if I can get a satisfactory answer to my question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California yield further?

Mr. GILLETT of California. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Is this an original right reserved in the Spanish grant through which the United States and everybody else get title?

Mr. GILLETT of California. I could not answer that, but I know it is a right recognized by our laws and by the courts.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the gentleman has made a motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. He has not; but is there objection to considering this bill by unanimous consent?

Mr. McNARY. I object.

Mr. GILLETT of California. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill. Is a second demanded?

Mr. McNARY. I ask for a second.

Mr. SMITH of California. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Massachusetts to twenty minutes.

Mr. SMITH of California. If the gentleman from Massachusetts desires to speak now, I will reserve my time.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to speak, but I am willing to give the gentleman from California a fair chance to explain the merits or demerits of this bill to the House. Up to this time I have been unable to agree with him in his view that this bill should pass. I am entirely unable to agree with the other view advanced here that any individual, in California or elsewhere, has a right to go upon Government land, upon a national forest reserve that we have established for the purpose of protecting the water supply, for irrigation and agricultural purposes, and take whatever water he chooses for whatever purpose he chooses, to use it for his own profit, without compensation to the Government, because that will tend to destroy the very purpose for which the forest reserve was created.

Now, therefore, as I have not had time to examine the provisions of the bill carefully, I am opposed to it in view of the explanations which have been made so far, and I am opposed to it in view of the fact that the company, having certain rights at the present time, now desires to get those rights in perpetuity, beyond the power of the Government or the power of the Secretary to take them away. In my own section of the country rights of this character are worth millions of dollars. Water rights were the foundation of prosperity in the old New England colonies, and they have been the foundation of the prosperity of whole sections of the country, and they are very jealously guarded. I believe that if this company desires any such rights, provisions should be put in this bill which will, in the first place, protect the forest reserve, and, in the next place, will bring to the Government proper compensation for the enormously valuable water rights which the company will get under the provisions of this bill. In any event, this company should not have these rights granted in perpetuity, but it should be retained in the power of this Congress, or the agent of this Congress, the Secretary of Agriculture, to revoke these rights whenever the interests of the people of that locality and of the State shall demand it. Such a bill as this should be very carefully inquired into, and the gentleman owes it to this House, as well as to his own community, to make a clear, careful statement of the matter.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SMITH of California. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I think the questions propounded by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McNARY] are very well put before the House, and that the House ought to fully understand the nature of this proceeding.

Under existing law there is power on the part of the Secretary to grant an easement in the forest reserve, in the nature of a mere license, but it is revocable at will on the part of the Secretary; and it has been held also to carry with it no rights whatever in the soil but such rights as may be taken away by a subsequent mineral location.

You can not locate a homestead in a forest reserve unless, perchance, the bill gets through which we passed this afternoon, but the forest reserves are open to general mineral location, and in the making of discovery of mineral the rights are at once attached, and with the power to perfect the title and absolutely cut out the previous right of an electric company in the nature of a license. Under the right-of-way act of 1875 the railway company can have a right over public lands to build its railway, and the courts hold that that is a grant, that they have an interest in the land, and that they have a right which can not be subsequently taken away by any other claim or location. As to electric power in forest reserves, it is, under present law, in the nature of a revocable license, and in these forest reserves which are upon the mineral lands these parties that are spending large sums of money to develop light and power find themselves in a position where some one can come in and locate across their right of way a mineral claim. Now, that mineral location ought to be subservient to this prior right, instead of being superior to it. This bill will not prevent them from locating mineral claims, but their right will be inferior to and subject to the provisions of the previous grant for right of way. If it were not so, parties making mineral location could come and locate a mineral claim and absolutely blackmail the previous investors who have spent large sums of money to supply power to the people down in the valley.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if this fact was not known to these people when they went on there and made the expenditure?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly; and they want to expend a great deal more money.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This bill gives them additional privileges.

Mr. LACEY. I will call my friend's attention to the situation. In 1898 we granted the same right that is provided for in this bill in the Grand Canyon in Arizona. In 1898 the same kind of a grant was made to the Pike's Peak company. In 1898 the same kind of a grant was made to the Cripple Creek company. In 1899 a like grant was made to the San Francisco company. We have passed these various bills making grants in substantially the same form that this bill does, and a general bill was afterwards enacted in order to relieve Congress from having these special grants from time to time; but unfortunately it was so drawn that it only gave a mere revocable license that was junior and inferior to the rights of subsequent mineral locators. In this bill we simply provide that the right of these people who are furnishing the power and the heat to the cities in the valley below shall have the superior right and not the inferior right.

It is not a donation at all. The bill expressly provides that the companies shall pay annually in advance to the officers of the Forestry Service, as compensation for the privilege granted, such sum as the Secretary of Agriculture may fix. Now, in spending such sums of money as they are necessarily compelled to spend for this purpose, gentlemen will recognize that something more than a revocable license, which may not only be taken away by the Government, but may be taken away by some individual coming in and under the mineral law destroying the right previously granted, ought to be provided for. They will understand that this is not fair to the men who are developing the country and spending their money for the benefit of their community and to help build it up.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT of California. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that there should be no objection to the passage of this bill, particularly if the people can understand the conditions existing in California, and the necessity for the uses of the water for improving the State in the various ways in which water is needed.

The old common law does not obtain in California as far as it affects the question of water rights. Under our law, and it has always been the law, a person has the right to go upon the public domain and appropriate the water not already appropriated that is running in any of the streams, take it any distance he may choose, to his mining claim or to the valley for the purpose of irrigation, or he may take it into some city to be used for public use there for the purpose of affording light and electrical power.

Our streams are precipitous; they are useful to us in the way of irrigation; they are useful to us in many ways, and because of the necessity existing there for the development of the State from the fact that it does not deprive anybody, under our law, of any right that is unjust to the Government in any way, these rights should be obtained. With these improvements established, it goes to the betterment of the State, for its benefit, and no harm comes to any interest. I believe the bill is a good measure and should become a law. It is for the interest of our State, and no one is deprived of any right; it takes nothing from the United States Government. I now yield back the rest of my time.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to have the gentleman on the other side use a portion of his time now.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Speaker, I will take my time later. I prefer to have the gentleman use his time.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Chairman, I would really like to have the gentleman state his objections to the bill, so that I may have some of my time left.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Speaker, I asked the gentleman previously to state his proposition and the reasons in favor. He has not yet done so. I should now like him to state the reasons he has for this bill, and after he has done that I will endeavor to reply to them.

Mr. SMITH of California. Then, I will undertake to use five minutes of my time at this time, and will thank the Chair to call my attention to that fact at the end of that time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has thirteen minutes remaining.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Speaker, I wish to assure the gentleman that I do not think his objection is in any sense captious, but I would like to have him start right on this proposition and understand that the power is not derived from the Federal Government—that is, the water power in California is not derived from the Federal Government. We are speaking now of nonnavigable streams, and the Federal Government has absolutely nothing to do with them, and this bill does not give any right or pretend to give any right to take water and use it for power purposes. If gentlemen will get that right in their minds, I think one of the objections will be met and passed. In our State legislature we had a good deal of discussion as to what California should do in the matter of giving these valuable water rights away; but Uncle Sam, so to speak, has absolutely nothing to do with them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman say that this bill does not give the right to take the water for power?

Mr. SMITH of California. I say it in no sense touches the right to appropriate the water. All we want here is the right of way.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman wants more than the right of way. He wants to confirm a license that was granted under the act——

Mr. SMITH of California. Not a license touching the water, but a license for the right of way.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A license to locate lands and rights of way and everything else within the forest reserves?

Mr. SMITH of California. No, sir. The only license which we received from the Federal Government was the license to pass over the public domain. It in no sense touches the right to use the water.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then what does this language mean: "And the ground actually occupied by and necessary for power houses, diverting dams, and necessary buildings and structures to be used in connection with the operation and maintenance of said water-power plants?" Is it not a fact that these companies obtained a right to locate these plants within this forest reserve and that now this law is proposed to confirm that to some extent or to make it less easy to take away the license that was given?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes; the purpose of the bill is this: The Government has already given to parties who have water privileges—and they obtained the water privilege from California—the right to pass over the land, to occupy certain tracts of land where their power houses come, and also, under this bill, the right to back the water up over 30 acres of land. The Government, under the present condition of the law, can give that, subject only to the right of the mineral location, and this bill undertakes to provide that it shall be absolute, and that a person who comes along and locates a mining claim where there is a water ditch—or conduit line, as we call it—shall take it subject to the right of the power company, putting them in exactly the same position as they are with reference to rights of way for railroads and rights of way for irrigating and mining ditches. There is nothing more.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the State of California own the water on Government lands, not navigable streams?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Under what law?

Mr. SMITH of California. By its original reservation when the State came into the Union.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. When the State came into the Union it reserved that?

Mr. SMITH of California. It has absolute power over the nonnavigable streams. The law of the State is very complete on the subject of the appropriation of water for irrigation and power purposes, and I think if the gentlemen will examine the law they will be convinced that I am right in that; that we are not asking from Congress any concession with reference to the use of the water, but merely the right of way over the land and certain small tracts of land of a few acres each for power purposes. Now, let me call attention to another fact which I think will have effect on gentlemen's minds. Five of these plants are completed. The company having this enterprise in hand took its chances on its limited right of way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California has now consumed five minutes.

Mr. SMITH of California. Then I will use three minutes more. That company took its chances on its limited right of way. They have invested $2,300,000 in five plants that are now furnishing electricity to Los Angeles and adjacent cities. In my own county they are building the sixth plant, at an expense of $1,700,000. Now, in all of these they are at the mercy, they have found subsequently, of anyone who may come in on the public domain and locate a mining claim.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish the gentleman would point out in this bill the provision that makes it impossible for a person to locate a mining claim on any of the land covered by water.

Mr. SMITH of California. It does not provide that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How will this law operate to prevent the doing of that, if it is permissible now?

Mr. SMITH of California. It does not prevent the location of a mining claim, but makes the mining claim subject to this.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Where does it say that?

Mr. SMITH of California. I will show you. It is in line 7:

That upon the conditions herein named, etc.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What page?

Mr. SMITH of California. Page 1:

That the right is hereby granted.

That is all we want.

Mr. FITZGERALD (reading)—

The duration of which shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Now, the law under which the present permit is granted provides that the Secretary may have the power to grant the permit, and that it can be revoked at his will, and it has this interesting provision in it, which I think the gentleman is trying to get away from, that—

Any permission given by the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this act may be revoked by him or his successors, and in his discretion shall not be held to confer any right or easement or interest in, to, or over any public land, reservation, or park.

It seems to me that is the particular thing the gentleman is trying to get away from.

Mr. SMITH of California. I could not state the language better than you do. That is exactly the thing we are trying to get away from. They do now take their rights under all of these large expenditures subject to that mischievous provision in the law. They do not acquire an easement, but a license, which any individual can revoke by locating a mining claim across it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will call the gentleman's attention to another thing in the law under which the original permit was granted. In this law, which it is now proposed to enact, is there any language which would indicate that the locator of a mining claim would have either a superior or an inferior right?

Mr. SMITH of California. Let me read that language to you again. That the license given by the Secretary of the Interior "shall not be held to confer any right or easement or interest in, to, or over public lands." If it does not confer a right, of course the mining locator does take right of way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SMITH of California. I reserve the balance of my time. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Speaker, I must state the gentleman has not cleared up my mind in regard to the purposes of this bill. If he merely desired to protect his company from invasion of what rights it now possesses because of mining claims that could have been accomplished very readily by a different sort of a bill by an amendment to the mining act, providing that the location of a mining claim across such a right as this would not vitiate that or interfere with that right, but this bill does not——

Mr. NEEDHAM. It has been so decided that it is.

Mr. McNARY. I say that an amendment could be introduced to the mining law specifically deciding that it could not, but this bill does not do that, and the men reporting this bill do not attempt to do that. They do not ask to amend the law so as to provide that a mining claim could not interfere with this enterprise, and that is not their real purpose. Their purpose is not to get away from the interference of mining claims, because, as a matter of fact, that is inconsequential. Their purpose is to get away from the interference of the United States Government and its agents and to get rights in this land which they do not now enjoy and in perpetuity.

Mr. SMITH of California. May I interrupt the gentleman for a question?

Mr. McNARY. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of California. Assuming that interpretation of the intent of the bill is correct, do you not think a man who makes an investment of this character ought to have a permanent right of way that could not be disturbed by the Federal Government or anybody else?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Speaker, I think the man who makes an investment of this character if he buys the ground, buys it from its original owners, buys the water rights, buys the water power, buys the right of way, is entitled to all the protection the law can give him; but when the United States Government creates a forest reserve for the purpose of providing the security of the water supply for agriculture and for irrigation, then when a company comes along and proposes to take the land which the United States Government has set apart for public uses for its own use and profit I do not believe that it should have rights in perpetuity which the Government could not take away.

Now, then, I maintain that the claim of the gentleman from California that the State of California has rights in the lands of the United States owned and set apart under the general laws is an absurd claim. That they have a right to take the water which the United States Government has protected and preserved for the benefit of the whole community—that they have the right, in other words (the State of California or its agents), to practically set aside the whole purpose of the forest reserve—is an absurd contention on their part.

Mr. GILLETT of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McNARY. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETT of California. Does not the gentleman know that the courts of our State have for years upheld and maintained this "absurdity" and the legislature has enacted "absurd laws" along this line?

Mr. McNARY. The laws of California are not regarded very highly in the eastern section of our country, or the decisions of their courts, and I doubt that such a decision as that would stand before the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. GILLETT of California. Does the gentleman know that the United States Supreme Court has upheld that very same doctrine?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman does not state his case. Of course he can make a statement of a certain character and without citing cases make it appear plausible, but the doctrine that the State of California has the right to go in and take the lands or water of the United States in a forest reserve, I do not believe that the case has been so decided, and I do not think it would be decided that way.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. McNARY. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the case the gentleman states has never been decided—namely, that the State of California can go into a forest reserve and take the Government land.

Mr. McNARY. Or individuals or corporations in the State.

Mr. MONDELL. But it is the law of the land, upheld by the courts, that the States have absolute control of the nonnavigable waters, and that has never been denied anywhere.

Mr. McNARY. But the States have no control over the lands or waters of the United States. You are endeavoring to give a company control of the lands of the United States in this act, rights which the State of California can not get, and yet, as the gentleman has stated, the State of California could give it as to the water.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question.

Mr. McNARY. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. If he has observed this statement of the Department, that this bill has been prepared in collaboration with the Forest Service, in order to place the Edison Electric Light Company in a more tolerable position in regard to the rights of way already granted them under the act of 1901, and for the reasons given it is recommended that this bill be favorably considered?

Mr. McNARY. I have observed that statement. I well know that in our section of the country that water rights and water powers are extremely valuable. A power of this character is worth the investment that the company has put into the land and the power stations, and we do not give them away for nothing. Now, then, if any such action has been taken, it has been at the instigation of the company, at the request of the company, under pressure from the company, and not for the benefit of the forestry reserve or the United States Government. If this company is to have rights of this character because of an easement in the land, it will give it a right of way to the water and give it the right to impound that water, give it right to build dams and divert and submerge lands and build up a great water supply, and will give it the power, irrevocably and for all time, for getting water of the United States Government which was created by the forestry reserve for the benefit of the whole people—give them very valuable rights worth millions of dollars for practically nothing.

Mr. MURPHY. Did not the gentleman vote for the Muscle Shoals bill?

Mr. McNARY. I did not; and I would vote to sustain the President of the United States in his veto of the Muscle Shoals bill, and I would vote also to take away from the power companies at Niagara their use of that stream, if the gentleman, the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, brings in a bill of that character. I would vote also against the continuance of the rights of the railroads in the Indian Territory to coal land. I think it would be a shame for this House to pass this bill. My record on that matter is entirely clear, and, having been fooled with the Indian bill in allowing it to go through without objection, I do not propose to allow another such bill to go through if I can prevent it.

The men who ask for these rights are men of wide experience, of great knowledge, and great enterprise. They know the value water power is to be in the future in the generation of electricity. Many people believe the consumption of coal will decrease materially in the future because of the generation of electricity and the transmission of the same for heat, light, and power from the small water powers, and large sections of the country will be relieved from the cost of coal by the utilization of water power in the running streams; yet we propose to give these people rights in perpetuity and give it practically for nothing.

I am opposed to the bill in principle and detail, and hope this House will not pass it without serious and grave amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me to correct a mistake that he made in reference to the coal lands?

Mr. McNARY. Yes; if it is a correction.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman spoke of the coal lands being saved by the bill passed recently for the settlement of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes. That has been made subject to the future action of Congress. It is a thing that I worked very hard for.

Mr. McNARY. This House has by its action protested against the control of coal by the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad and the Pennsylvania Railroad, and at the same time passed a bill continuing control of coal in the Indian Territory.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. On the other hand, we prevented either the lease or the sale of the coal lands.

Mr. McNARY. But the committee continued the present leases.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly. You would not violate the obligation of a contract.

Mr. McNARY. And by the continuance of the leases you have given those people the benefit of it. I would not confirm previous mistakes in legislation. I am opposed to the control of the public lands in this way.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Would the gentleman violate the obligation of a contract?

Mr. McNARY. I would not violate the obligation of any contract, but it is not necessary for your committee to continue these contracts. I am opposed to this character of bill. It has been known throughout a number of years that we take lands in the West for dams and for other purposes without getting any adequate compensation for the Government.

We gave valuable grants under the timber and stone act and under the desert-land act, and under these thousands and even millions of acres of the public land have been stolen, and men would be found again to do the same thing. I am opposed to this bill from principle. I am opposed to giving this company the right to go and take the waters of this Government, created by means of the forest law, and give them the right to take that water for all time, taking extremely valuable rights in perpetuity without compensation. I hope the House will not pass this bill at this time. If it has passed bills of this character, it is time it ceased to do so, and protect the right of the people and the community and see that the Government gets adequate compensation for a valuable privilege. It gets none under this bill.

Mr. SMITH of California. Do you desire to use any more of your time?

Mr. McNARY. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SMITH of California. How much time has the other side, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Four minutes.

Mr. SMITH of California. I hope the gentleman will use his time, because I desire to close the argument.

Mr. McNARY. The gentleman to whom I desired to yield is not in the Chamber.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California has the right to close, if he demands it.

Mr. SMITH of California. I demand the right to close the debate, and I would like the gentleman to consume his time now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California has five minutes and the gentleman from Massachusetts four minutes. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to use his time.

Mr. McNARY. The gentleman to whom I was to give my time is not in the Chamber, and unless somebody wants to speak I am perfectly willing that the gentleman may proceed. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. SMITH of California. I would just like to say this, Mr. Speaker: That the bill was prepared under the Agricultural and Interior Departments—all the rights and conditions as they will affect the forest reservations, as to the conservation of the waters. Under all these circumstances, the water is not being used for power only, but it is first used for power and then for irrigation. We are not allowing the power companies to waste any water.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Secretary of Agriculture approves this bill?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes, sir; the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior prepared this bill in their offices.

Mr. GILLETT of California. And the Secretary of Agriculture has charge of the forest reservations in our State.

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT of California. And this is a conservation of the water.

Mr. SMITH of California. This is what he says in the conclusion of a letter printed in the report:

For the reasons given above, I recommend that your committee consider the bill H. R. 11490 favorably.

So that it has the entire indorsement of every Department of the Government that it affects.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the United States get any return for giving this right?

Mr. SMITH of California. This bill contains the only provision that I think was ever written into a right-of-way act providing that the Department may collect a rental on the land used. I do not believe there is a railroad or an irrigating ditch or a mining ditch right of way that has ever been granted before that contained that provision, by which the United States can recover a rental value for it.

Mr. McNARY. I should like to ask the gentleman whether this provision applies to a payment for the right of way or whether it applies to a payment for the water.

Mr. SMITH of California. It does not contain a provision for the payment for the water, because the water belongs to the State of California.

Mr. McNARY. The water is the extremely valuable part of the grant, because the right of way controls the water, and the water is worth millions.

Mr. SMITH of California. Let me read the provision of section 9:

SEC. 9. That the said company shall pay annually in advance to the proper officer of the Forest Service, as compensation for the privileges hereby granted, such reasonable sum as the Secretary of Agriculture may fix from year to year.

Now, you may say it is for the water or for the land. I say it is for the land, because we do not concede that the Federal Government has anything to do with the nonnavigable streams of California. I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. McNARY) there were—ayes 125, noes 26.

Accordingly (two-thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended, and the bill passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4760. An act granting an increase of pension to John B. Lee.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 6982. An act for the relief of James W. Jones;

H. R. 229. An act providing for the purchase of metal and the coinage of minor coins, and the distribution and redemption of said coins; and

H. R. 17987. An act making an appropriation for the improvement of the mouth of the Columbia River.

BRIDGE ACROSS TUG BRANCH OF BIG SANDY RIVER.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17945) authorizing the Borderland Coal Company to construct a bridge across Tug Branch of Big Sandy River.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Borderland Coal Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of West Virginia, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad, tramroad, conveyor, wagon or foot bridge and approaches thereto, across the Tug Fork of Big Sandy River, at a point about 1½ miles east of Nolan, Mingo County (where the same forms the boundary line between the States of Kentucky and West Virginia), in the State of West Virginia, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BARTLETT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL LAND OFFICE, NORTH DAKOTA.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2452) creating an additional land office in the State of North Dakota.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all of that portion of North Dakota lying north of the twelfth standard parallel and west of a line beginning at the juncture of the range line between ranges 92 and 93 with the said twelfth standard parallel and running north to the fifteenth standard parallel, and thence west along the said fifteenth standard parallel to the range line between ranges 96 and 97, and thence north along the said range line to the international boundary line, all west of the principal meridian, be, and the same is hereby, created into a separate land district, to be known as the Williston district; and the land office for said district shall be located at the town of Williston until such time as the President may, in his discretion, remove the site of said land office from said town.

SEC. 2. That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a register and a receiver for said district; and they shall be subject to the same laws and be entitled to the same compensation as is or may hereafter be provided by law in relation to the existing land offices and officers in said State.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I desire to know something about the necessity for this bill, as it seems to create a new land district, with a register and the other necessary officers. Will the gentleman explain the necessity for the legislation?

Mr. GRONNA. This bill has the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Public Lands, and it is also indorsed by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. These indorsements are very good, but is there a necessity for an additional land office in North Dakota?

Mr. GRONNA. The old district is a very large one. It is now about 130 miles wide and 180 miles long. The district which it is proposed to create will be approximately 66 miles wide and 91 miles long. This bill is in the interest of the convenience of the settlers.

Mr. LACEY. Will my colleague on the committee yield just for a moment? I should like to suggest to my friend from Indiana that the Department can do away with unnecessary land offices at any time by consolidation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But is that ever done?

Mr. LACEY. Oh, yes; a number have been done away with recently; but the Department can not add any land office, and it recommended this additional office.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Since we have gotten along all these years and have been disposing of the public domain so rapidly, and the means of communication have increased so greatly, I have been wondering why it is necessary at this time to create a new land district.

Mr. LACEY. There has been a great rush to North Dakota, where for a great many years the settlers were few. They found that the land has a sufficient rainfall, and a very large settlement has gone in.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have a great deal of faith in the judgment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] as well as in the judgment of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. Does the gentleman from Iowa say to the House that, in his opinion, this district ought to be created; that it is necessary for the administration of the public-land service?

Mr. LACEY. I base my judgment on the views of the Commissioner of the Land Office, who says that it is desirable to have an additional land office there. They have just done away with the office at Kingfisher, Okla.; consolidated it with another office. Frequent reductions are made in number of the land offices.

Mr. PAYNE. If this is created now by official act, can the President afterwards consolidate it under the general act?

Mr. LACEY. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. It being a later statute.

Mr. LACEY. The offices when created are under the general law, but they must be established first by statute, but may be discontinued by Executive order.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GRONNA, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

AMENDING SECTION 5501 OF THE REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I present conference report on the bill (H. R. 10129) to amend section 5501 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, for the purpose of being printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The conference report and statement will be printed under the rule.

APPEALS IN CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS.

Mr. NEVIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15434) to regulate appeals in criminal prosecutions.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in all criminal prosecutions the United States shall have the same right of review by writ of error that is given to the defendant, including the right to a bill of exceptions: Provided, That if on such writ of error it shall be found that there was error in the rulings of the court during the trial, a verdict in favor of the defendant shall not be set aside.

The following amendment was recommended by the committee:

Add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage and shall apply to all cases pending."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. NEVIN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17415) to authorize the assignees of coal-land locations to make entry under the coal-land laws applicable to Alaska.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any citizen or citizens of the United States may make entry under the coal-land laws applicable to Alaska for not more than 1,280 acres of any coal lands in that district which are covered by the valid locations of any persons who have assigned their interests therein to such citizen or citizens; but no person shall be entitled to locate more than 160 acres of such lands, and no person shall be permitted to obtain patent to more than 1,280 acres of such lands.

The following amendments, recommended by the committee, were read:

In line 6, after the word "the," insert "contiguous." At the end of the bill add the following: "Provided, That no entry under this act shall exceed 2 miles in length."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if this is a unanimous report?

Mr. LACEY. It is a unanimous report, and this legislation is requested by the three commissioners who represent Alaska.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PROHIBITING ALIENS FROM FISHING IN THE WATERS OF ALASKA.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 267) to prohibit aliens from fishing in the waters of Alaska, and I ask unanimous consent that the amendment in the nature of a substitute be read in lieu of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that the substitute be read? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

That it shall be unlawful for any person not a citizen of the United States, or who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and is a bona fide resident therein, or for any company, corporation, or association not organized or authorized to transact business under the laws of the United States or under the laws of any State, Territory, or district thereof, or for any person not a native of Alaska, to catch or kill, or attempt to catch or kill, except with rod, spear, or gaff, any fish of any kind or species whatsoever in any of the waters of Alaska under the jurisdiction of the United States: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this act shall prevent those lawfully taking fish in the said waters from selling the same, fresh or cured, in Alaska or in Alaskan waters, to any alien person, company, or vessel then being lawfully in said waters: And provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall prevent any person, firm, corporation, or association lawfully entitled to fish in the waters of Alaska from employing alien labor, either at stated wages or by piecework, or both, in connection with Alaskan fisheries, canneries, salteries, etc.

SEC. 2. That every person, company, corporation, or association found guilty of a violation of any provision of this act or of any regulation made thereunder shall, for each offense, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $500, which fine shall be a lien against any vessel or other property of the offending party or which was used in the commission of such unlawful act. Every vessel used or employed in violation of any provision of this act or of any regulation made thereunder shall be liable to a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500, and may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel in any court having jurisdiction of the offense.

SEC. 3. That the violation of any provision of this act or of any regulation made thereunder may be prosecuted in any United States district court of Alaska, California, Oregon, or Washington.

SEC. 4. That the collector of customs of the district of Alaska is hereby authorized to search and seize every foreign vessel and arrest every person violating any provision of this act or any regulation made thereunder, and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall have power to authorize officers of the Navy and of the Revenue-Cutter Service and agents of the Department of Commerce and Labor to likewise make such searches, seizures, and arrests. If any foreign vessel shall be found within the waters to which this act applies, having on board fresh or cured fish and apparatus or implement suitable for killing or taking fish, it shall be presumed that the vessel and apparatus were used in violation of this act until it is otherwise sufficiently proved. And every vessel, its tackle, apparatus, or implements so seized shall be given into the custody of the United States marshal of either of the districts mentioned in section 3 of this act, and shall be held by him subject to the proceedings provided for in section 2 of this act. The facts in connection with such seizure shall be at once reported to the United States district attorney for the district to which the vessel so seized shall be taken, whose duty it shall be to institute the proper proceedings.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall have power to make rules and regulations not inconsistent with law to carry into effect the provisions of this act, and such rules and regulations shall have the force and effect of law. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to enforce the provisions of this act and the rules and regulations made thereunder, and for that purpose he may employ, through the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Navy, the vessels of the United States Revenue-Cutter Service and of the Navy: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed as affecting any existing treaty or convention between the United States and any foreign power.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question or two. Does this prohibit the natives from engaging in fishing in Alaska?

Mr. POWERS. It does not.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I know that they are not citizens of the United States, that they are not Indians, and that they have no rights under the law.

Mr. POWERS. We discussed all that in the committee. I will say to the gentleman that this is a substitute for the Senate bill, and we think it is somewhat better.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. In the reading of the bill I notice that it provides, does it not, that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may make regulations for carrying out the purposes of the bill, and that these regulations shall have the same effect as law? Does the bill provide penalties for the violation of any of the regulations that may be subsequently made by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Section 5 covers that matter and reads as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall have power to make rules and regulations not inconsistent with law to carry into effect the provisions of this act, and such rules and regulations shall have the force and effect of law. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to enforce the provisions of this act and the rules and regulations made thereunder, and for that purpose he may employ, through the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Navy, the vessels of the United States Revenue-Cutter Service and of the Navy: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed as affecting any existing treaty or convention between the United States and any foreign power.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I want in a few words to enter my protest against the conferring of power upon heads of Departments to enact legislation, and particularly criminal legislation.

Mr. PAYNE. Can they do it?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not think they can, and I do not think we ought to go through the formality of conferring upon them any such authority.

We are doing altogether too much of that kind of business, authorizing bureaus and heads of Departments to make regulations that have practically the force of law, and in many instances we attach penalties for the violation of those regulations, penalties that are enforced, and I do not believe that if any of them should be taken into the courts they would stand for a minute. The power of legislation belongs in the Congress and not in the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and we ought to make all the regulations that we can consistently do. Of course regulations for administrative purposes are necessary. I shall not object to this bill, because I do not know enough about it.

Mr. POWERS. I wish to say to the gentleman from Indiana that the sole purpose of this bill is to give some protection to our own people in our own fisheries.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But why not permit a motion to strike out that provision? It gives these regulations the same force and effect as law.

Mr. POWERS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Personally I have no special objection to its going out, but I know the Department of Commerce and Labor feel that without this provision in the bill they may have difficulty in making it effective in a working way. Personally I do not think that we should confer, or attempt to confer, the legislative power of Congress upon any branch or Department of the Government.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. They can make regulations for the purpose of administration—that is all right enough—in respect to their own officers, but to give those regulations the same effect as law I think is going beyond our power.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I agree with the gentleman in a legislative sense, but it is proper to state that this same kind of legislation has been put into a number of other bills.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I hope that clause will go out. We had that same question before the Committee on Ways and Means the other day with reference to the denatured-alcohol bill, and we were asked by the Department to put in such a provision, and the committee considered it and unanimously reported against it.

Mr. POWERS. I apprehend that clause can be stricken out by unanimous consent, and I will ask unanimous consent to have it stricken out. I will offer that as an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, strike out in lines 20 and 21 the following words: "and such rules and regulations shall have the force and effect of law."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following committee amendments, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 25, strike out the words "alien labor" and insert in lieu thereof the words "as laborers any aliens who can now be legally employed under the existing laws of the United States."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. POWERS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ROLLS OF CITIZENSHIP OF THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES OF INDIANS.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17719) to prevent the copying, selling, or disposing of any rolls of citizenship of the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, and providing punishment therefor, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether or not this will permit an attorney to get a certified copy of the rolls of any family that he desires to.

Mr. CURTIS. I should say he could, to use in any lawful manner. The bill authorizes officers of the Government to use and give out copies of the rolls for any purpose necessary or required by law, but does not permit the hawking and selling of the rolls stolen a few weeks ago. The rolls of two different tribes were stolen. There is a law now to punish the person or persons who stole them, but there is no law to prosecute those who may sell the rolls or who may assist such persons in disposing of them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on agreeing to the amendments.
